THE

THE PREFACE.

How unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my self, to undertake a Work of this mixture; mine own reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it been begotten then, with my first dawn of day, when the light of common knowledg began to open it self to my younger years, and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted, that the darkness of Age and Death would have covered over both It and Me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly, purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, with this our renowned Island of Great Britain. I confess that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other travels, to have set together (as I could) the unjointed and scattered frame of our English affairs, than of the Universal: in whom, had there been no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough: the day of a tempestuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost and soul-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured, with the desire to satisfy those few friends, which I have tried by the fire of Adversity; the former enforcing, the later persuading; have caused me to make my thoughts legible, and my self the subject of every Opinion, wise or weak.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were (Fortune changing) sped much better in any Age. For Prosperity and Adversity have ever more tyed and untied vulgar affections. And as we see it in Experience, That Dogs do always bark at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude; who, wanting that Vertue which we call Honesty in all men, and that especial gift of G O D, which we call Charity in Christian men; condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given: led therewith by uncertain Report only; which His Majesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou have enquired the matter: understand first, and then reform righteously. Rumor, res sine Teste, sine Judice, maligna; fallax; Rumour is without Witness, without Judge, malicious, and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar Opinion it was, that gave S. Augultine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the evil. And herein no man hath given a better Rule, than this of Seneca; Conscientiæ satisfaciamus: nihil in famam laboremus, sequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis; Let us satisfy our own Consciences, and not trouble our selves with fame; be it never so ill, it is to be despised, so we deserve well.

For my self, if I have in any thing served my Country, and prized it before my private: the general acceptance can yield me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair Sun-shine day to a Sea-man after Shipwrack; and the contrary no other harm, than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her whom I must still honour in the dust; though further than the defence of Her excellent Person, I never persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supreme Judge of all the World, hath taken the account: so as for this kind of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parata, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them; I can neither envy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine own mis-bap in that kind; but content my self to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour after satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzey, not of hope, seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can travel the World without a Pass-port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internal forms of the mind, as there are external figures of men; there were then some possibility to persuade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying, and extensive vertue of dead Earth, and of that breathing life which God hath cast upon slime and dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read and hear; and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; every one hath received a several Picture of face, and every one a divers Picture of mind; every one a form a-part, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found so great diversity of Opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations: so many natural and unnatural; wise, foolish, manly, and childish affections and passions in mortal men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of Plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the form internal.

And though it pleased God to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himself; yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward works of men (so farr as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to guess at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to express the one by the other, very near the life, did not craft in many, fear in the most, and the World's love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compass it hath, to qualifie and mask over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest: No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour; the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their own natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himself, but that his heart may be sometimes seen at his tongues end.

In this great discord, and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selves to the Multitude; Omnes honeste rei malus Judex est vulgus: The common People are evil Judges of honest things, and whose Wisdom (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised: if to the better sort; every understanding hath a peculiar judgment, by which it both censures other men, and valueth it self. And therefore unto me it will not seem strange, though I find these my worthless Papers torn with Rats; seeing the stabsfull Censurers of all Ages have not spared to tax the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the severest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest lovers of Justice, with Popularity; and those of the truest Valour and Fortitude, with Vain-glory. But of these natures, which lie in wait to find fault, and to turn good into evil, seeing Solomon complained long since; and that the very Age of the World renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leave the Professors to their easie ways of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common and approved custom of those, who have left the memories of Time-past to after-Ages; to give, as near as I can, the same right to History which they have done. Yet, seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is, that among many other benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane knowledge, That it hath given us life in our understanding, since the World it self had life and beginning, even to this day; yea, it hath triumphed over time, which, besides it, nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vast and devouring space of many thousands of years, and given so fair and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now (as if we had lived then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus. The wise work (saith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it self. By it (I say) it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed; how it was covered with waters, and again re-peopled; how Kings and Kingdoms have flourished and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt we owe unto History, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darkness of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of History a policy no less wise than eternal; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-passed miseries with our own like errors and ill doings. But it is neither of Examples the most lively instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes, as to make us remember, That the Infinite Eye and Wisdom of God doth pierce thorow all our pretences, as to make us remember, That the Justice of God doth require none other accuser, than our own consciences; which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the Opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, cover from his knowledge. And so much did that heathen Wisdom confess, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God: If any (saith Euripides) having in his life committed wickedness, think he can hide it from the everlasting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GODS Judgments in particular, upon those of all degrees, which have played with his Mercies, would require a Volume a-part: for the Sea of Examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the Earth; and their fortunes written only in the memories of those that lived with them: so as they who succeeded, and have not seen the fall of others, do not fear their own faults. GODS Judgments upon the greater and greatest have been left to Posterity; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their virtue, who have gathered the acts and ends of Men mighty and remarkable in the World. Now, to point far off, and to speak of the conversion of Angels into Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who have gnawn the grass of the earth with Beasts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or, of that wise working of Pharaoh, when he slew the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or, of the policy of Jezebel, in covering the murder of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the Law, with many thousands of the like: what were it aiter, than to make an hopeles proof, that far-off Examples would not be left to the same far-off Respects, as heretofore? For who hath not observed, what labour, practise, peril, blood-shed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the World have undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make themselves and their Issues Masters of the World? And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the rest, no fruit, no flower, grass, nor leaf, springing upon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No, their very roots and ruins do hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum evertuntur, vel stando & durando deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is either overturned by the hand of man, or at length, by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruins, are diversly given by those that ground their Opinions on second causes. All Kingdoms and States have fallen (say the Politicians) by outward and foreign force, or by inward negligence and dissention, or by a third cause arising from both. Others observe, That the greatest have sunk down under their own weight; of which Livie hath a touch: eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the divine Providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set down the date and period of every Estate, before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will give my self a day over to resolve.

For seeing the first Books of the following Story, have undertaken the Discourse of the first Kings and Kingdoms: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface to travel after, and over-take far-off Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, and their Neighbour Princes; who having beheld, both in divine and humane letters, the success of infidelity, injustice, and cruelty; have (notwithstanding) planted after the same pattern.

True it is, that the judgments of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred up alike with examples of like nature: But every one is touched most with that which most nearly seemeth to touch his own private; Or otherwise best suited with his apprehension. But the judgments of GOD are for ever unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long process of time, and won to give his blessing in one Age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter fruits of irreligious policy, as well among those examples that are found in Ages removed farr from the present, as in those of later times. And that it may no less appear by evident proof, than by asseveration, That ill doing hath always been attended with ill success; I will here, by way of Preface,

face, run over some examples, which the Work ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman Race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Justice, upon the children of Henry the First. For that King, when by force, craft, and cruelty, he had dispossessed, over-reach'd, and lastly made blind, and destroyed his elder Brother, Robert, Duke of Normandy, to make his own Sons Lords of the Land; GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephews and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the Sea, with above an hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the Kings dearly beloved.

To pass over the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certain, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did again break out, and that so often, and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine Race (very few excepted) died of the same disease. And although the young years of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious; yet, in that he afterwards caused his own Uncle, the Earl of Kent, to die, for no other offence, than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earl as then supposed to be living; the King making that to be Treason in his Uncle, which was indeed Treason in himself, (had his Uncles intelligence been true) this, I say, made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty, the secret and unsearchable Judgment of GOD, revenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third; and so it fell out, even to the last of that Line, that in the second or third descent, they were all buried under the ruins of those buildings, of which the Mortar had been tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the Second, who saw both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he always took himself for over-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earls of Huntington and Kent, Montagu and Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those days, as others have done in these; hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves by the murder of Gloucester; died soon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farr more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himself (who, in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his Greatness, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himself by breach of Faith, Charters, and Patents:) He was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cousin-Germaine and Vassal, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crown traitorous; who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend only the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himself, and brake faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament, to whom he swore, that the deposed King should live. After he had enjoyed this Realm some few years, and in that time had been set upon on all sides by his Subjects, and never free from Conspiracies and Rebellions: he saw (if Souls immortal see and discern any things after the Bodies Death) his Grand-child Henry

the Sixth, and his Son the Prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crown (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his Race, and by the Issues of his enemies worn and enjoy'd; enemies, whom, by his own practice, he supposed that he had left no less powerless, than the succession of the Kingdom questionable, by entailing the same upon his own Issues by Parliament. And, out of doubt, humane reason could have judged no otherwise, but that these cautious provisions of the Father, seconded by the valour and signal victories of his Son Henry the Fifth, had buried the hopes of every Competitor, under the despair of all re-conquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might so have judged, were not this passage of Causabon also true; Dies, hora, momentum, evertendis dominationibus sufficet, quæ Adamantinis credebantur radidibus esse fundatæ; A day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things that seem to have been founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now, for Henry the Sixth, upon whom the greatest storm of his Grand-father's grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard, the Grand-child of Edward; although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince, yet, as he refused the Daughter of Armagnac, of the House of Navarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Anjou (by which he lost all that he had in France) so in condescending to the unworthy death of his Uncle of Gloucester, the main and strong Pillar of the House of Lancaster; He drew on himself and his Kingdom the greatest joint-loss and dishonour, that ever it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said, which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the Third of France, Qu'il estoit une fort gentille Prince; mais son reign eût advenu en une fort mauvais temps: That he was a very gentle Prince; but his Reign happened in a very unfortunate Season.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practicers and contrivers of the Duke's death: Buckingham and Suffolk, because the Duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise under the Queen had been absolute; the Queen, in respect of her personal wound, sprateque injuria formæ, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the success to the counsel. For after the cutting down of Gloucester, York grew up so fast, as he dared to dispute his Right, both by arguments and arms; in which quarrel, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, in pleading God to strike down York; yet his Son the Earl of March, following the plain path which his Father had trodden out, despoiled Henry the Father, and Edward the Son, both of their lives and Kingdom. And what was the end now of that politick Lady the Queen, other than this, That she lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers; that she lived to look on, while her Husband the King, and her only Son the Prince, were bewen in sunder; while the Crown was set on his head that did it? She lived to see her self despoiled of her estate, and of her movables; and lastly, her Father, by rendring up the Crown of France, the Earldom of Provence, and other places, for the payment of 50000. crowns for her Ransome, to become a stark Beggard. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides calleth fine, but unrightunrighteous: for other fruit hath it never yielded since the World was.

And now it came to Edward the Fourth's turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaster were rooted up, one only Earl of Richmond excepted; whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise it self stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld to allowed the laughter which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his own presence; of which tragical Affairs, there was not one that escaped the Judgment of GOD in the same kind. And he, which (besides the execution of his Brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himself had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the Sixth, his Predecessor; taught him also, by the same art, to kill his own Sons and Successors, Edward and Richard. For, those Kings which have fold the blood of others at a low rate; have but made the Market for their own enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the Fourth, succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Master in mischief of all that fore-went him; who, although, for the necessity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to perform in his own Person, than all the rest; yet he so well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his own interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queen, and to all her kindred, as he easily allured them to condescend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Uncle and half Brother, should (for the first) be severed from him: Secondly, he wrought their consent to have them imprisoned: And lastly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their Heads severed from their Bodies. And having now brought those his chief instruments to exercise that common Precept which the Devil hath written upon every Post, namely, To depress those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had depressed; He urged that Argument so farr, and so forcibly; as nothing but the death of the young King himself, and of his Brother, could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckingham's head, That, whensoever the King or his Brother, should have able years to exercise their power, they would take a most severe revenge of that curleß wrong offered to their Uncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sons was without suspect; and yet the Devil, who never dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But, when he found by Catesby, who sounded him, that he was not fordable, he first resolved to kill him sitting in Council; wherein having failed with his Sword, he set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could move his appetite, he caused his head to be stricken off, before he eat his Dinner. A greater Judgment of God, than this upon Hastings, I have never observed in any Story. For, the self-same day that the Earl Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of Law, or offence given) by Hastings advice, executed at Pomfret; I say, Hastings himself, in the same day, and (as I take it) in the same hour, in the same lawless manner, had his Head struck off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent Oration persuaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earl-down of Hereford for reward, besides the hope of marrying his Daughter to the Kings only Son; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest servant; he had his Head severed from his Body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what success had Richard himself after all these mischiefs and murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian Religion; and after such time as with a mercilefs hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Natural Lords, other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it took end, ere himself could well look over and discern it? the great out-cry of innocent blood obtained at GOD'S hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruel King, Henry the Seventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods Justice. A politick Prince he was, if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beat down and overturned as many strong oppositions, both before and after he wore the Crown, as ever King of England did; I say, by his wisdom, because, as he ever left the reins of his affections in the hands of his profit, so he always weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the Eleventh, whom he followed in all was royal, or royal-like; but he was far more just, and begun not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his servants, and therein exceeding wise; for whatsoever himself gave, he himself received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well, that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great Kings, than great Subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he grieved his Subjects, he wisely put it off on those that he found fit ministers for such actions. Howsoever, the taking off of Stanleys Head, who set the Crown on his, and the death of the young Earl of Warwick, Son to George Duke of Clarence, shews, as the success also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancestors; for his possession in the first Line ended in his Grand-child, as that of Edward the Third, and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now, for King Henry the Eighth, if all the Pictures and Patterns of a mercilefs Prince were lost in the World, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the Story of this King. For, how many servants did he advance in haste (but for what virtue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others, of more desert, gave he abundant flowers from whence to gather Honey, and in the end of Harvest burnt them in the Fire? How many Wives did he cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age, could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles have kept the account) did he execute? yet, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to give his account to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; and executed the Earl of Surrey the Son; the one, whose deserving he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the Kings service; the other never having committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure; the one exceeding valiant and advised; the other no less valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrows which he heaped upon the

Fatherless

The Preface.

Fatherless and Widows, at home; and besides the vain enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more treasure, than all our victorious Kings did in their several Conquests; what causeless and cruel wars did he make upon his own Nephew King James the Fifth? What Laws and Wills did he devise to establish this Kingdom in his own Issues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut down those Branches, which sprang from the same root that himself did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious provisions) it pleased God to take away all his own, without increase; though, for themselves in their several kinds, all Princes of eminent virtue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy Sword hath made other women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among other women. And that blood which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold air of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath dissolved by the Sun-shine of his grace; from whence his Majesty now living, and long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the World were infused into one eye; yet could it not discern in his life, even to this day, any one of those foul spots, by which the consciences of all the fore-named Princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent blood on the Sword of his Justice, with which the most that fore-went him have stained both their hands and fame. And for this Crown of England, it may truly be avowed; that he hath received it even from the Hand of God, and hath staid the time of putting it on, howsoever he were provoked to hasten it: That he never took revenge of any man that sought to put him beside it; That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princes did: That His Majesty entered not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary Gate, which his own right set open; and into which, by a general love and obedience, He was received. And howsoever His Majesty's preceding title to this Kingdom, was preferred by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the year 1559.) yet he never pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heir, in all the time of her long Reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to God for the uniting of the Northern parts of Britanny to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which, though they were severed, but by small brooks and banks, yet, by reason of the long continued war, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This, I say, is not the least of God's blessings, which His Majesty hath brought with him unto this Land; No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to the height, they will appear as a Mole-Hill, compared with the Mountain of this concord. And if all the Historians since then have acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose and the White, for the greatest happiness (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdom received from God, certainly, the peace between the two Lions of Gold and Gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our British Blood, heretofore, and during the difference, so often and abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdom more enabled to recover her ancient honour and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies, and conquests. It is true, that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But, had the Duke of Parma, in the year 1588, joined the Army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the South-

The Preface.

Charles the grofs becomes Lord of all that the Sons of Debonaire held in Germany; where-with not contented, he invades Charles the simple; but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his Wife, and of his Understanding; he dies a distracted Beggar. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes, Major of the Palace, then by Robert, the Brother of Eudes; and lastly, being taken by the Earl of Vermandois, he is forced to die in the prison of Peron. Loys the Son of Charles the simple breaks his neck in chasing a Wolf; and of the two Sons of this Loys, the one dies of poison, the other dies in the Prison of Orleans; after whom, Hugh Capet, of another Race, and a stranger to the French, makes himself King.

These miserable ends had the Issues of Debonaire; who after he had once apparelled Injustice with authority, his Sons and Successors took up the fashion, and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the same was torn from their shoulders, every man desisted them as miserable and naked Beggars. The wretched success they had (saith a Learned French-man) shews, Que en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la justice: That in the death of that Prince; to wit, of Bernard the Son of Pepin, the true Heir of Charlemain, men had more meddling than God or Justice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certain that Francis the First, one of the Worthiest Kings (except for that Fault) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himself, after he had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol, and Cabrières, to the Parliament of Provence, which poor people were thereupon burnt and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true that the said King Francis repented himself of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his Son, to do Justice upon the murderers, threatening his Son with GOD'S Judgments, if he neglected it. But this unseasonable care of his, God was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry was slain in sport by Montgomery, we all may remember what became of his four Sons, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which, although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautiful and vertuous Ladies; yet were they, one after another, cast out of the World, without Stock or Seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of Faith; with all their Massacres upon those of the Religion, and great effusion of blood, the Crown was set on his Head, whom they all laboured to dissolve; the Protestants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong Cities than ever they had.

Let us now see if God be not the same God in Spain as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no further back than to Don Pedro of Castile; in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the Third, and the great Evan Vasilowick of Moscow, were but petty ones: this Castilian, of all the Christian and Heathen Kings, having been the most mercilefs. For, besides those of his own Blood and Nobility, which he had caused to be slain in his own Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis; the great Master of Calatrava, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces, and cast into the streets, denying him Christian burial: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Mauriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile; he made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousin-Germans, his Brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nuges de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Tolédo, Guttiere his great Treasurer, and all his Kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest Brothers, innocent Princes, whom after he had kept in close Prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteen years, and the other fourteen; he murdered them there. Nay, he spared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Arch-bishop of Toledo, and the Dean to be killed, of purpose to enjoy their Treasures; so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar, King of Barbary, with thirty seven of his Nobility, that came unto him for succor, with a great sum of Money, to levy (by his favour) some Companies of Souldiers to return withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declareth him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdom, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster; He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother, the Earl of Altramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their Inheritance, which, but for their Fathers injustice and cruelty, had never been in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke John of Burgoign, who, after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend Church-men, the Earl of gran Pre, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of Justice of the Chamber of Accounts, Treasury, Requests (with sixteen others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have mastered France; He was soon after stricken with an Ax in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slain. These were the lovers of other mens miseries; and miseries found them out.

Now, for the Kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry the Seventh, Henry the Eighth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon, was the first, and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himself to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten thereunto the Kingdom of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his Wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own Neece, the Daughter of the last Henry; but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, he also cast his own Neece out of the Kingdom of Navarre; and, contrary to Faith, and the Promise he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any Army to invade it. This King, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick, Kings of Naples, Princes of his own Blood, and by double alliance tied unto him; sold them to the French; and with the same Army, sent for their succour under Gonfalvo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdom with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politick King, who sold Heaven and his own Honour, to make his Son the Prince of Spain, the greatest Monarch of the World; saw him die in the flower of his years; and his Wife great with child, with her untimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldest Daughter, married unto Don Alphonso Prince of Portugal, beheld her first Husband break his neck in her presence; and being with child by her second, died with it. A just Judgment of God upon the Race of Alphonso, now wholly extinguished; who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugal, by the slaughter of their children ; but had formerly slain with his own hand, the Son and only consort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutcheſs of Viſco. The ſecond Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned fool, and died mad, and deprived. His third Daughter, beſtowed on King Henry the Eighth, he ſaw caſt off by the King ; the Mother of many troubles in England ; and the Mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy zeal, ſhed a world of innocent blood ; left Calice to the French ; and died heart-broken without increaſe. To conclude, all thoſe Kingdoms of Ferdinand have maſters of a new name ; and by a ſtrange Family are governed and poſſeſſed.

Charls the Fifth, Son to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whoſe vain enterpriſes upon the French, upon the Almans and other Princes and States ; ſo many multitudes of Chriſtian Souldiers, and renowned Captains were conſumed ; who gave the while a moſt perillous entrance to the Turks, and ſuffered Rhodes, the Key of Chriſtendom, to be taken ; was in concluſion chaſed out of France, and, in a ſort, out of Germany ; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, ſtole away from Inſpurg ; and ſcaled the Alpes by torch-light, perſued by Duke Maurice ; having hoped to ſwallow up all thoſe Dominions ; wherein he conſisted nothing, ſave his own diſgraces. And having after the ſlaughter of ſo many Millions of men, no one foot of ground in either ; He crept into a Cloſter, and made himſelf a Penſioner of an hundred thouſand Duckets by the year, to his Son Philip, from whom he very ſlowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

His Son again, King Philip the Second, not ſatisfied to hold Holland and Zeland, (wreſted by his Anceſtors from Jaqueline, their lawfull Princeſs) and to poſſeſs in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands ; perſuaded by that miſchievous Cardinal of Granvile, and other Romiſh Tyrants ; not onely forgot the moſt remarkable ſervices, done to his Father the Emperor, by the Nobility of thoſe Countreys, not onely forgot the Preſent made him upon his entry of forty Millions of Florens, called the Novaile aid ; nor onely forgot that he had twice moſt ſolemnly ſworn to the General States, to maintain and preſerve their antient Rights, Privileges, and Cuſtoms, which they had enjoyed under their thirty and five Earls before him, Conditional Princes of thoſe Provinces : but beginning firſt to conſtrain them, and entral them by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, and then to impoveriſh them by many new deviſed and intollerable Impoſitions, he laſtly, by ſtrong hand and main force, attempted to make himſelf not onely an abſolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Sovereigns of England and France ; but Turk-like, to tread under his feet all their Natural and Fundamental Laws, Privileges, and antient Rights. To effect which, after he had eaſily obtain from the Pope a diſpenſation of his former Oaths (which Diſpenſation was the true cauſe of the Warr and Bloodſhed ſince then) ; and after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own Nobility, under the Government of his baſe Siſter, Margaret of Auſtria, and the Cardinal Granvile ; He employed that moſt mercileſs Spaniard, Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, Duke of Alva, followed with a powerful Army of ſtrange Nations ; by whom he firſt ſlaughtered that renowned Captain, the Earl of Egmont, Prince of Gavare ; and Philip Montmorency Earl of Horn ; made away Montigue, and the Marqueſs of Bergues, and cut off in thoſe ſix years (that Alva Governed) of Gentlemen and others, eighteen thouſand and ſix hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, beſides all his other barbarous murders and maſſacres. By whoſe miniſtry, when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wiſhed ends, having it in his hope to work, that by ſubtilty which he had failed to perform by force, He ſent for Governour, his baſtard Brother, Don John of Auſtria ; a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to thoſe people. But he, uſing the ſame Papal advantage that his Predeceſſors had done, make no ſcruple to take Oath upon the holy Evangelists, to obſerve the Treaty made with the General States ; and to diſcharge the Low-Countreys of all Spaniards, and other ſtrangers therein gariſoned ; Towards whoſe Pay and Paſport, the Netherlands ſtrained themſelves to make a payment of 600000. pounds. Which Moneys received, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed the Citadels of Antwerp and Nemures, not doubting (being unſuſpected by the States) to have poſſeſſed himſelf of all the maſtering places of thoſe Provinces. For whatſoever he overthly pretended, he held in ſecret a contrary counſel with the Secretary Eſcovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Miniſters of the Spaniſh Tyranny formerly praſtiſed, and now again intended. But let us now ſee the effect and end of this perjury, and of all other the Duke's cruelties. Firſt, for himſelf ; after he had murdered ſo many of the Nobility ; executed (as aforeſaid) eighteen thouſand ſix hundred in ſix years, and moſt cruelly ſlain Man, Woman, and Child in Mecklin, Zutphen, Narden, and other places ; and after he had conſumed ſix and thirty Millions of treaſure in ſix years, notwithstanding his Spaniſh vaunt, That he would ſuffocate the Holanders in their own Butter-barrels, and Milk-tubs ; He departed the Countrey no otherwiſe accompanied, than with the curſe and deteſtation of the whole Nation ; leaving His Majesties Affairs in a ten-fold worſe eſtate than he found them at his firſt arrival. For Don John, whoſe haughty conceit of himſelf overcame the greateſt difficulties ; though his judgment were over-weak, to mannage the leaſt : What wonders did his fearful breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his Brothers jealousie and diſtruſt, with the untimely death that ſeized on him, even in the flower of his youth ? And for Eſcovedo his ſharp-witted Secretary, who in his own inagination had conquered for his Maſter, both England and the Netherlands ; being ſent into Spain upon ſome new projeſt, he was at the firſt arrival, and before any acceſs to the King, by certain Ruſſians, appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Laſtly, if we conſider the King of Spain's carriage, his counſel and ſucceſs in this buſineſs, there is nothing left to the memory of Man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, and the lives of above four hundred thouſand Chriſtians, for the loſs of all thoſe Countreys, which, for beauty, gave place to none ; and for revenue, did equal his Weſt-Indies ; for the loſs of a Nation which moſt willingly obeyed him ; and who, at this day, after forty years Warr, are, in deſpight of all his forces, become a free Eſtate, and far more rich and powerfull than they were, when he firſt began to impoveriſh and oppreſs them.

Oh ! by what plots, by what for-ſwearings, betrayings, oppreſſions, imprifonments, tortures, poiſonings, and under what reaſons of State, and politick ſubtilty, have theſe fore-named Kings, both ſtrangers, and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themſelves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent miniſters ! and in the end, have brought thoſe things to paſs for their enemies, and ſeen an effect ſo direſtly contrary to all their own counſels and cruelties ; as the one could never have hoped for themselves ; and the other never have succeeded ; if no such opposition had ever been made. GOD hath said it, and performed it ever : Perdam sapientiam sapientum ; I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this ? and to what end do we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead ; seeing the world is the same that it hath been ; and the children of the present time, will still obey their Parents ? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the World are exercised. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawfull ; and either we hope to hold them for ever ; or at least we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For, as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledg, in all things that concern our selves ; or persuade our selves, that GOD hath given us Letters Patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a Non obstante : so we neither look behind us what hath been, nor before us what shall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body : we are by it joined to the earth ; we are compounded of earth ; and we inhabit it. The Heavens are high, far off, and unsearchable ; we have sense and feeling of corporal things ; and of eternal grace, but by revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are also earthly ; and it is less to be wondered at, that the words of worthy men cannot cleanse them ; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose understanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For, as the Prophet Esay cried out long ago, Lord, who hath believed our reports ? And out of doubt, as Esay complained then for himself and others : so are they less believed, every day after other. For, although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in every man's mouth, yea, in the discourse of every woman, who, for the greatest number are but Idols of Vanity ; what is it other than an universal dissimulation ? We profess that we know GOD, but by works we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life ; for the Devils know them better than men. Beatitudo non est divinarum cognitio, sed vita divina. And certainly, there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private contention, the passionate dispute, the personal hatred, and the perpetual warr, massacres, and murders, for Religion among Christians ; the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well near driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not soon resolve, that took knowledg but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their lives which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heaven ; and that the World in self were but used as it ought, and as an Inn, or place wherein to repose our selves in passing on towards our Celestial habitation ; when on the contrary, besides the Discourse and outward profession, the Soul hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in Religion ; and while we act in gesture and voice, divine virtues, in all the course of our lives, we renounce our Persons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Justice, and Truth, have but their being in tearms, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Solomon desireth to be the School-Mistress of the Knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the World ; it is enough that we give it our good word : but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtain honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the marks, which (when we have bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our own ; the care our own in this life, the peril our own in the future ; and yet, when we have gathered the greatest abundance, we our selves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability, that ever man had, hath told us, that this is the use : When goods increase (saith Solomon) they also increase that eat them ; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes ? As for those that devour the rest, and follow us in fair weather ; they again forsake us in the first tempest of misfortune, and steer away before the Sea and Wind ; leaving us to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand Examples, I will take but one out of Master Darnet, and use his own words : Whilest the Emperor Charles the Fifth, after the resignation of his estates, stayed at Ulofing for Wind, to carry him his last journey into Spain ; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his Brother Ferdinand's Embassador, till the deep of the night. And when Seldius should depart ; the Emperor calling for some of his servants, and no body answering him, (for those that attended upon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleep) the Emperor took up the Candle himself, and went before Seldius, to light him down the Stairs ; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when he was come to the Stairs foot, he said thus unto him ; Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperor, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast known in thy time environed with so many mighty Armies and Guards of Souldiers, thou hast also seen alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea, even of his own servants, &c. I acknowledg this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD, which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say, that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first is, the reverend respect that is held of Great Men, and the Honour done unto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed : provided, that an inward love for their Justice and Piety, accompany the outward worship given to their places and power ; without which, what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the out-cry of an Herd of Animals, who, without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noise they make ? For, seeing it is a thing exceeding rare to distinguish Virtue and Fortune ; the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded ; the most virtuous (if unprosperous) have ever been despised. For, as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune her self rides the Man. Who, when he is descended, and on foot ; the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man ; a base Groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt spurns at the other with equal liberty.

The second is, the greatning of our Posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behind us. Certainly, of those which conceive that their Souls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Lactantius saith of certain Heathen Philosophers ; Quod sapientes sunt in re frustra. For, when our spirits immortal shall be once separate from our mortal bodies, and disposed by GOD ; there remaineth in them no other joy of their Posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a King's Palace, nor any other sorrow for their poverty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth up a Beggars cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt vivi, etiam eorum filii, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viventium non inter-sunt; The dead, though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their own children; for the Souls of those departed, are not conversant with their affairs that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Job; who tells us, That we know not if our Sons shall be honourable; neither shall we understand concerning them, whether they shall be of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth; Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain; he heapech up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The living (saieth he) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all; for, who can shew unto man, what shall be after him under the Sun? He therefore accounteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and travel in the World; not knowing after death, whether a fool or a wise man should enjoy the fruits thereof; which made me (saieth he) endeavour even to abhor mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death, God hath reserved? Mans knowledge being but in his hope, seeing the Prophet Elay confesseth of the Elest, That Abraham is ignorant of us, and Israel knows us not. But hereof we are assured, that the long and dark night of death of whose following day we shall never behold the dawn till his return that hath triumphed over it) shall cover us over till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall again receive Organs glorified, and incorruptible, the seats of Angelical affections; in so great admiration shall the Souls of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or less joy; nor any return of forgone and mortal affection towards Friends, Kinred, or Children. Of whom, whether we shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them, no man can assure us; and the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary; If a divine life retain any of those faculties, which the Soul exercised in a mortal body; we shall not at that time so divide the joys of Heaven, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remain in the World. No, be their estates greater than ever the World gave, we shall (by the difference known unto us) even detest their consideration. And whatsoever comfort shall remain of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised living: and in that Piety, Justice, and firm Faith, for which it pleased the Infinite Mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as unnecessary and vain? Certainly, no. For that Infinite Wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his Angels by degrees; which hath given greater and less light and beauty to heavenly bodies; which hath made differences between Beasts and Birds; created the Eagle, and the Flie, the Cedar, and the Shrub; and among Stones, given the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes, or Leaders of the people; Magistrates, Judges, and other degrees among men. And, as Honour is left to Posterity, for a mark and ensign of the vertue and understanding of their Ancestors; so (seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggary; and, that Titles, without proportionable estates, fall under the miserable succour of other mens pity) I account it foolishnes to condemn such a care; Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our own buildings out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth first prefer the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the form and beauty; and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quesitas; so Jeremy cries, Wo unto them that erect their houses by unrighteousness, and their chambers without equity; And Elay the same, Wo to those that spoil, and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Solomon, that he commandeth us, not to drink the Wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood; and not to swallow them up alive, whose riches we covet; for such are the ways (saieth he) of every one that is greedy of gain.

And, if we could afford our selves but so much leisure, as to consider, That he which hath most in this world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it; and that he which hath the longest time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for ever; I say, if both, to wit, our proportion in the World, and our time in the World, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of understanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being; and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending; coveting those mortal things of the World, as if our Souls were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selves, after the World, were but mortal.

But let every man value his own wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the rich man think all fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the Revenger esteem all negligent, that have not troden down their opposites; the Politician all gross, that cannot Merchandize their faith: Yet, when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winds drive us, and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end; Then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad and severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health and Felicity) return again, and pay us to the utmost for all the pleasing passages of our lives past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our selves can no longer exercise cruelty to others; and it is only then, that we are stricken through the Soul with this terrible Sentence, That God will not be mocked. For if, according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved: and that God spared not his Angels; where shall those appear, who, having served their appetites all their lives, presume to think, that the severe Commandments of the All-powerfull God were given but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth us, if we can but satisfy it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reverend Father, cum hac spe ad æternos labores & bella descendunt! I confess, that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it said, That we ended well; for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But, what shall we call a dis-esteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God; if those men do not oppose him, dis-esteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for God, to ask him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For, what do they otherwise, that die this kind of well-dying, but say unto God, as followeth? We beseech thee, O God, that all the falsehoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our lives past, may be pleasing unto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that have had no leisure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a just God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishness. For I shall prejudice my Son (which I am resolved not to do) if I make restitution; and confess myself to have been unjust (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings have either found out a new God, or made One; and in all likelihood, such a Leaden One, as Lewis the Eleventh wore in his Cap; which, when he had caused any that he feared or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head, and kiss it; beseeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when, by the practice of a Cardinal, and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earl of Armagnac to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed, fit to be used towards a Leaden, but not towards the Everliving G O D. But of this composition are all devout lovers of the World, that they fear all that is dureless and ridiculous; they fear the plots and practices of their opposites, and their very whisperings; they fear the Opinions of men, which beat but upon shadows; they flatter and forsake the prosperous and unprosperous, be they Friends or Kings; yea, they dive under water, like Ducks, at every pebble-stone, that is but thrown towards them by a powerful hand; and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giant-like valour against the terrible judgments of the All-powerfull God; yea, they shew themselves Gods against God, and Slaves towards men; towards men, whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now, for the rest; If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poor and oppressed, whom we account wretched; we shall find the hapiness of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subject to enterchange (witness the sudden downfall of the greatest Princes, and the speediest uprising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certain, whereof to boast; nor the other so uncertain, whereof to bewail it self. For, there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of either, or all, the very next hour, or day to come. Quid vesper vehat, incertum est; What the evening will bring with it, it is uncertain. And yet ye cannot tell (saith S. James) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set up, and to morrow he shall not be found; for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the air which compasseth adversity, be very obscure; yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which environeth worldly glory; through which, for the clearness thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let adversity seem what it will; to happy men ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those under the cross, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For, be it that we have lived many years, and (according to Solomon) in them all we have rejoiced; or be it that we have measured the same length of days, and therein have evermore sorrowed; yet, looking back from our present being, we find both the one and the other; to wit, the joy and wo, failed out of sight; and death, which doth pursue us, and hold us in chase, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro est, mors tenet; Whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it. So, as whosoever he be, to whom Fortune hath been a servant, and the Time a friend; let him but take the account of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what he hath reserved, either of Beauty and Youth,

or fore-gone delights; what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatever else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and he shall find that all the Art which his elder years have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavy, secret, and sad sighs. He shall find nothing remaining, but those sorrows, which grow up after our fast-springing youth, over-take it, when it is at a stand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither; in so much as looking back from the very instant time, and from our now being, the poor, diseased, and captive creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and pains, as he, that is most blessed in common Opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasure and delights. For whatsoever is cast behind us, is just nothing; and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it: Omnia quæ eventura sunt, in incerto jacent. Only those few black Swans I must except; who, having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear, and embrace both, as necessary guides to endless glory.

For my self, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrows of this life are but of two sorts; whereof the one hath respect to G O D; the other to the World. In the first, we complain to G O D against our selves, for our offences against him; and confess, Et tu justus es in omnibus quæ venerunt super nos; And thou, O Lord, art just in all that hath befallen us. In the second, we complain to our selves against G O D; as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites; or for taking them from us having had them; forgetting that humble and just acknowledgment of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. To the first of which, S. Paul hath promised blessedness; to the second, death. And out of doubt, he is either a fool, or ingratefull to G O D, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how mean soever his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him; or doth not acknowledge, how sharp soever his afflictions be, that the same are yet far less, than those which are due unto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the adversities of the World but tributa vivendi; the tributes of living: a wise Christian man ought to know them, and bear them as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them man-like, and resolutely, and not as those whining Souldiers do, Qui gementes sequuntur Imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our Tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play; and hath not, in their distribution, been partial to the most mighty Princes of the World; That gave unto Darius the part of the greatest Emperor, and the part of the most miserable Beggar; a Beggar, begging Water of an Enemy to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, and in the same day, the Footstool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also played, being taken by Sapore) that made Bellisarius play the most victorious Captain, and lastly, the part of a blind Beggar; of which, examples of many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least Worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly, there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous World, than to resolve, That the change of Fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of Garments on the less. For, when on the one and the other, every man wears

wears but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now, if any man out of weakness prize the passages of this world otherwise (for, saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est revocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasy of ours, which forgets in the brains of Man all the miseries (the corporal excepted) whereunto he is subject. Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adversity work all that they work. For, seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoever Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a foolish madness in the shipwrack of worldly things, where all sinks but the Sorrow, to save it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato; To fall under Fortune, of all other, the most miserable destiny.

But it is now time to found a retreat, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit; and withall, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the Picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of divine Providence, every where found (the first divine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) have persuaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For, though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other; Creation inferring Providence (for what father forsaketh the child that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation; Yet many of those that have seemed to excel in worldly wisdom, have gone about to dis-join this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the World had a beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now, although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for, by Faith, we understand that the World was made by the Word of God) be too weighty a work for Aristotle's rotten ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verbal Doctrine; yet that the necessity of Infinite power, and the World's beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary, even in the judgment of Natural reason, wherein he believed, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no less strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than tears in the rest) have so retrench'd their minds from the following and overtaking of Truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the law of those Philosophical Principles; as all contrary kind of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned, either for phantastical, or curious. But doth it follow, that the Positions of Heathen Philosophers are undoubtedly Grounds and Principles indeed, because so called? Or, that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reason hath built any thing so strong against it self, as the same reason can hardly assail it, much less batter it down: the same in every question of Nature, and infinite power, may be approved for a fundamental Law of humane knowledge. For, saith Charron, in his Book of Wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'authorite quel'autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference; Every humane proposition hath equal authority, if reason make not a difference: the rest being but the Fables of Principles. But herof, how shall the upright and impartial judgment of man give a Sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And, to this purpose, it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur; They neglect their own wisdom, who without any judgment approve the invention of those that fore-went them; and suffer themselves, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which sloth and dullness, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant, as it hath set true Philosophy, Physick and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the first, Contra negantem principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for myself, I shall never be persuaded, that God hath shut up all the light of Learning within the Lamborn of Aristotle's brains; or, that it was ever said unto him, as unto Eldras, Accendam in corde tuo Lucernam intellectus; That God hath given invention but to the Heathen, and that they only invaded Nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same Nature having consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these, and these, be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught us; and not Reason; and so hath Experience without Art. The Cheef-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that soure Rennet doth coagulate her Milk into a Curd. But, if we ask a reason of this cause, why the soureness doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfy this, and many other like vulgar questions. But man, to cover his ignorance in the least things, who cannot give a true reason for the Grass under his feet, why it should be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet discover the way and reason of Nature's working, in those which are far less noble Creatures than himself; who is far more noble than the Heavens themselves: Man (saith Solomon) that can hardly discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find out the things that are before us; that hath so short a time in the World, as he no sooner begins to learn, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his own Soul, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could never so much as define, but by the Action and Effect, telling us what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else doth know, but GOD that created it (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my Soul, saith Job.) Man, I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his own life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Job) is so excellent as we know him not; and examine the beginning of the work, which had end before Mankind had a beginning of being. He will disable God's power to make a World, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the Moes of the Air for a cause; cast the work on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of Form; and lastly, for want of a work-man, have it Eternal; which latter Opinion Aristotle, to make himself the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World; and his Sectators have maintained it; Parati ac conjurati, quos sequuntur Philosophorum animis invictis opiniones tueri. Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it self; this, of all other, were the greatest Idiotism. For, if it were the cause of it self at any time; then there was also a time when it self was not; at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceive, that it could neither procure in self, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible.

of God. But the other, to prove the World's eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient and effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted. Inferring, that God being for ever a sufficient and effectual cause of the World, the effect of the cause should also have been for ever; to wit, the World universal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confess a sufficient and effectual cause of the World (to wit, an Almighty God) in his Antecedent; and the same God to be a God restrained in his Conclusion; to make God free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but work, matter being present: As Fire, to burn things combustible. Again, he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can work, and doth not work, if it afterward work, it is either thereto moved by it self, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to act: But God (saith he) is immovable, and is neither moved by himself, nor by any other; but being always the same, doth always work. Whence he concludeth, If the World were caused by God, that he was for ever the cause thereof; and therefore eternal. The answer to this is very easie; For that God's performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the World for ever, did also withhold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it self sufficient, others add further, that the Pattern or Image of the World may be said to be eternal; which the Platonicks call Spirituale mundum; and do in this sort distinguish the Idæa and Creation in time. Spiritualis est mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus: That representative, or the intentional word (say they) the samplar of this visible world, the first work of GOD, was equally antient with the Architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever shall be. This material world, the second work or creature of GOD, doth differ from the Worker in this; that it was not from everlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for ever to come; The first point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confess: The other they understand no otherwise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shall be a new Heaven, and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue; though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this consideration, of an eternal and unchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporal effect; Touching which point, Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded Essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissolvable) is continued, and knit to the Divine Being, by an individual and inseparable power, flowing from Divine unity; and that the World's natural appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and understanding divine; and that this virtue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Virtue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little; even as the whole material World is not altogether; but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a River, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the Water, but it is perpetually renewed in the continual ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to return to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, willball deny that ever it shall have any end, and to this purpose affirm, That it was never heard, never read, never seen, no, not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered corruption; or that they appear any way the older by continuance; or in any sort otherwise than they were; which had they been subject to final corruption, some change would have been discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newness, and that they have not continued so long, than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjectural arguments may receive answer by conjectures; it then seemeth, that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Pliny, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossly mistaken; or else those parts of the World, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sun's heat, neither were the Seas under the Equinoctial navigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we navigate, passable enough. We read also many Histories of Deluges; and how that in the time of Phæton, divers places in the World were burnt up, by the Sun's violent heat.

But in a word, this Observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That Stone-walls, of matter molding and friable, have stood two or three thousand years; that many things have been digged up out of the Earth, of that depth, as supposed to have been buried by the general Flood; without any alteration, either of substance or figure; yea, it is believed, and it is very probable, that the Gold which is daily found in Mines and Rocks, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted; what great alterations should we look for in Celestial and Quintessential bodies? And yet we have reason to think, that the Sun, by whose help all creatures are generate, doth not in these later Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Giants, such as the eldest World had, nor Mighty Men, such as the elder World had; but all things in general are reputed of less virtue which from the Heavens receive virtue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger Discourse, we might easily fetch store of proof; as that this World shall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good Answer that can be to this Objection: If the World were eternal; why not all things in the World eternal? If there were no first, no Cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible Wisdom, but that every Nature had been alike eternal; and Man more rational than every other Nature; Why had not the eternal reason of Man, provided for his eternal Being in the World? For, if all were equal, why not equal conditions to all? Why should Heavenly bodies live for ever, and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keep the Centre, and gave order that it should should hang in the Air; that the Sun should travel between the Tropicks, and never exceed those bounds, nor fail to perform that Progress once in every year; the Moon to live by borrowed light; the fixed Starrs (according to common opinion) to be fastned like nails in a Cart-wheel; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or, if none of these had power over other; was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sun by his perpetual travel within those two Circles, hath visited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turns and times? Out of doubt, if the Sun have of his own accord kept this course in all eternity; He may justly be called eternal Charity, and everlasting Love. The same may be said of all the Starrs, who being all of them most large and clear fountains of vertue and operation, may also be called eternal Vertues; the Earth may be called eternal Patience; the Moon, an eternal Borrower, and Beggar; and Man, of all other the most miserable, eternally Mortal. And what were this, but to believe again in the old Play of the gods? Yea, in more gods by Millions, than ever Hesiodus dream'd of. But in stead of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortal eyes: and the eyes of our reason discern it better; That the Sun, Moon, Starrs, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained; themselves they have not constrained, nor could. Cuius determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit; Every thing hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now, for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the School of Aristotle hath both commended many errors unto us, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World; so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotle's Physicks, or primo de Coelo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphysicks, I say, that the best is but nominal, and serving onely to difference the beginning of Natural motion from Artificial: which yet the Academics open better; when they call it, A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soul of the World; who give the first place to Providence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they understand GOD) Dux & Caput; Fatum, medium ex providentia prodians; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all; yet that it hath choice or understanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam; He onely can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly express'd by Ficinus: Potest verò Natura, vel per diversa media, vel ex diversis materiis, diversa facere; sublata vero mediorum materiarumque diversitate, vel unicum, vel similitum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diversity of means, or out of diversity of matter, to produce divers things; but taking away the diversity of means, and the diversity of matter, it then works but one or the like work; neither can it but work, matter being present. Now, if Nature made choice of diversity of matter, to work all these variable works of Heaven and Earth; it had then both understanding and will; it had counsel to begin; reason to dispose

dispose; vertue and knowledge; to finish, and power to govern; without which, all things had been but one and the same; all of the matter of Heaven; or all of the matter of Earth. And, if we grant Nature this will, and this understanding, this counsel, this reason, and power; Cur natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the first and highest place to divine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnesque summum locum divino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say, in short, that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fiunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for ever the same.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety, monstrous, to confound God and Nature; be it but in terms. For it is God, that onely disposeth of all things according to his own will, and maketh of one Earth, vessels of honour and dishonour: It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God that commandeth all; it is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth. It is Nature that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth, nor loveth the good it doth. It is God which is the Father, and hath begotten all things; it is Nature which is begotten by all things, in which it liveth and laboureth; for by it self it existeth not. For, shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct every River into the salt Sea? Shall we term it knowledge in Fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these; by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore, seeing all things work as they do (call it by Form, or Nature, or by what you please) yet, because they work by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power; we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder; and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a faculty, as neither knowing it self, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doth yet work all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore every reasonable man, taking to himself for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that ever the World had, to wit; That there is a power Infinite, and eternal (which also necessity doth prove unto us, without the help of Faith and Reason; without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which have been delivered by divine Letters, as the waters of a running River do successively peruse each other from the first fountains.

Thus much, I say, it is, that Reason it self hath taught us; and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur; quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion follows; because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience, Plato calleth absoluti boni scientiam, The Science of the absolute good: And another, Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith Idore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples persuaded: Fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis fundetur. I confess it, That to enquire further, as of the Essence of God, of his Power, of his Art, and by what mean he created the World; Or of his secret judgment, and the causes, is not an affect of Reason; Sed cum ratione insaniunt; but they grow mad with reason, that enquire after it: For, as it is no shame nor dishonour (saith a French Author) de faire arrest au but qu'on n'aleu surpasser; For a man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to pass on further: so whatsoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeth it to be so; as understanding it self not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knows the end of his own Art. For, seeing both Reason and Necessity teach us (Reason, which is pars divini spiritus in corpus humanum meris) that the World was made by a Power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make us know, that the same infinite Power is every where in the World; and yet how every where it cannot inform us: our belief hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells us, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by Man.

I have been already over-long, to make any large Discourse, either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse; especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the unsuitable division of the Books, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first Part finished. All men know, that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of those things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it suits well enough with a great many Books of this Age, which speak too much, and yet say little, ipsi nobis furto subducimur; We are stolen away from our selves, setting a high price on all that is our own. But bereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I believe as he doth; That who so thinks himself the wisest man, is but a poor and miserable Ignorant. Those that are the best men of Warr, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do always keep the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from their selves; from self-love, self-estimation, and self-opinion.

Generally, concerning the order of the Work, I have only taken counsel from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the down-fall of Babel take up the first Part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of Posterity; some few enterprizes, greater in Fame than Faith, of Ninus and Semiramis, excepted.

It was the Story of the Hebrews, of all before Olympiads, that overcame the consuming disease of Time, and preserved it self from the very Cradle and Beginning to this day; and yet not so entire, but that the large Discourses thereof (to which, in many Scriptures, we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the Actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here and there in the same Time, I am driven to relate by way of digression; of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent

The Preface.

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;

They appear here and there, floating in the great gulf of Time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to us; though most of the Authors Names have perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Laws; they had their diversity of Government; they had Kingly rule; Nobility; Policy in Warr; Navigation, and all, or the most of needful Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a general History we should have left a great deal of Nakedness by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is, that I have also made many others; which, if they shall be laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heap of humane error. For, seeing we digress in the ways of our lives; yea, seeing the life of Man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their lives and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Laws of History, and of the kinds.

The same hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman, Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Laws are also taught us by the Prophets and Apostles; and every day preach'd unto us. But we still make large digressions; yea, the Teachers themselves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilest it so flourished, that the affairs of the Nations adjoining had reference thereunto. The like observance was to be used towards the Fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Persians; as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empire, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their several beginnings, in such times and places as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers; who seldom give names to those small Brooks, whereof many joined together make great Rivers; till such time as they become united, and run in main stream to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, and the Style not every where like it self; the first shews their legitimation and true Parent; the second will excuse it self upon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, used stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Aeneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I use divers Hebrew words in my first Book, and elsewhere, in which language others may think, and my self acknowledg it, that I am altogether ignorant; but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in Latine Characters in S. Senensis; and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say, I had been beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondered at, having had an eleven years leisure to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other Tongue; How-

The Preface.

Howsoever, I know that it will be said by many, That I might have been more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine own Times, having been permitted to draw water as near the Well-head as another. To this I answer, That whosoever in writing a modern History, shall follow Truth too near the heels, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistress or Guide that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself; and he that walks after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kind of course, Temper, or Baseness. It is true, that I never travelled after mens Opinions, when I might have made the best use of them; and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardise, or both, do yet (when Death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the World, between the Bed and the Grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest Times; wherein also, why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and tax the Vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead; and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly, if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting them over anew, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsely.

For, I protest before the Majesty of God, that I malice no man under the Sun. Impossible I know it is, to please all; seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions, but that they seem divers persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect, Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis, sed tibi; (or as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an antient Philosopher, Satis est unus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inesimable Prince, Henry, the successive hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertook this Work. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amiss. It is now left to the World without a Master; from which, all that is presented, hath received both blows and thanks: Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis judicii, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these Discourses are idle. I know, that as the charitable will judge charitably; so against those, qui gloriantur in malicia, my present adversary hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore have not far to fall; and for rising again, as in the Natural privation, there is no recession to habit; so it is seldom seen in the privation politick, I do therefore forbear to stile my Readers, Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good Opinions, or to promise a second and third Volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certain, let us claw the Reader with never to many courteous Phrases, yet shall we evermore be thought fools, that write foolishly. For conclusion, all the hope I have, lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well-deserving of them, than ever I shall do again. For had it been otherwise; I should hardly have had this leisure to have made my self a Fool in Print.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

OD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power uncessable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant clarity invisible; an Understanding which it self can only comprehend; an Essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the Work of the World: in the wonderful magnitude whereof (all which he imbraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that glory which cannot be measured, and withall, that one, and yet universal Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven, we perceive a shadow of his divine Countenance; in his merciful provision for all that live, his manifold goodness: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World universal, by the absolute Art of his own Word, his Power and Almightyness; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdom, and Goodness, being all but Attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestial and Terrestrial bodies: Terrestrial, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestial, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continual and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Maker.

In these more than wonderful works, God (saith *Hugo) speaketh unto man: and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, those that live, witness in themselves;

the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the feat of infinite power, no more then infinite power it self can be limited: for his place is in Himself, whom no magnitude else can contain: Bar. 3. 34. 25. How great is the house of God (saith Baruch) how large is the place of his possession; it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeasurable.

But leaving multiplicity of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the Heavens, and Orbs superlunary, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, Materia, Chaos, possibilitas, sive posse fieri. Which matter (saith Calvin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the Universal: an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

Moses first nameth Heaven and Earth (putting waters both in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Mists, and (as Basil saith) Preparare naturam aque ad secunditatem vitalis; To prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulness.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures express: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is under the Moon, and subject to alteration. Corrupt feeds bring forth corrupt plants, to which the pure heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Ej. 51. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth; for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry land was mixt and covered with the waters and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seed of the Earth, much less of the Universal. Initio tu, Domine, terram fundasti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and again, The Earth was covered with the Deep (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith

David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth us also, that earth rarified may become water: water, air; fire; and so on the contrary, Dens ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam convertit, God turneth the substance of fire by air into water.

For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Calum veru & terra in statu creationis remanserunt quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specificall water; but the same more properly significeth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero Aquas fecit; For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this name or word the Latines, wanting a voice to express it, call it in the plural, Aquas, Waters.

This Maim, or indigested matter, or Chaos, created in the beginning, was without form, that is, without the proper form, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the Waters. And the Earth was void, that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that form, which it now retaineth; then did the earth bud forth the herb, which seedeth seed, and the fruitful tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good, that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecti sunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their invention of Demogorgon; Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos: of which Ovid; Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod tegit omnia) Calum,

Unus erat toto nature vultus in Orbe, Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaque moles. Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heaven, that all doth hide, In all the World one onely face of Nature did abide:

Which Chaos might, a huge rude heap.

§. VI.

§. VI.

How it to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the waters; and that this is not to be searched curiously.

After the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without form, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters use the word superferebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat or fovebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meanz tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recebo (saith Basil): which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a special likeness. Verbum translatum est ab ovibus pullitici sue incubantibus, quomodo spirituali, & plane innarrabili, non autem corporali modo: The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense, Ventus à conspectu Dei sufflavit: or as another understand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147. Psalm, He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elobim Merachefet, id est, effraciter motitans, confovers, ac agitans super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cherishing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh four originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and material, to wit, Causa, which is the divine Divinities of Jehi, which is, fiat, sive erit, Let it be, or, It shall be. Que vox verbo dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the Word of God.

The third, Spiritus Elobim, the Spirit of God, id est, Vis quedam divina, agilis ac presens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens; that is, A certain divine power, or strength every where active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, Materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my self, I am resolved (Cum Deus sit super rationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderful waies of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortal body. *Animalis homo que Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Ej. 1. 8.) are not your thoughts, neither are your waies my waies.* And as the world hath not known God himself: so are his waies (according to S. Paul) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality, and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely known to God. *Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Ubiquity) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our understanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis eterne, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference between God and man, if mans understanding could conceive the counsels and disposing of that eternal Majesty; and therefore to be over-curious in searching how the all-powerful Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative spirit distinguishing, gave form to the Matter of the Universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who not contented with a known and safe Foord, will presume to pass over the greatest River in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the Sun, and enjoy his light, as long as we look towards it, but tenderly and circumpectly: we warm our selves safely, while we stand near the fire; but if we seek to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.*

But to eschew curiosity: this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, Vis cause efficiens, The force of the efficient cause; S. Augustine sometimes taketh for the Holy Ghost; sometimes for a wind or breath, Sub nomine spiritus, under the name of a spirit, which is sometimes lo taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem: Toftatus, Voluntatem & mentem Dei, The will and mind of God; which Mens, Plato in Timæo maketh Animam mundi, The soul of the world

cies of the colour in that glass. And again, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet understood: so it is diffused, whether this light first created, be the same which the Sun inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the Sun's creation.

But by the most wise and unchanged order, which God observed in the works of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sun: for Moses repeateth twice the main parts of the Universal: first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with form: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry Land; and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or dry Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their virtual forms: So the Sun although it had not its formal perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the first day God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God find cause why it should move (by which motion, days and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sun might give light, heat, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herb, &c. God caused the Sun to move, and (by interchange of time) to visit every part of the inferior World; by his heat to stir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerful Word he approved, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the use and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to ask of Job, By what way is the Light parted, and where is the way where Light dwelleth & we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under mans understanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith Edras): And those which inhabit the Heavens, do only know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknown in Heaven, nothing perfectly known on Earth. Res vere sunt in mundo invisibiles; in mundo visibili umbra rerum: Things themselves are in the invisible World; in the world visible, but their shadows. Surely, if this Light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth necreth unto spirituality; and if it have any corporality, then of all other the most subtle and pure; for howsoever, it is of all things seen, the most beautiful, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficial. For it ministereth unto men, and other creatures, all civil influences; it dissipateth those dark thoughts and sorrows, which the darkness both begetteth and maintaineth; it discovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an Angelical swiftness, our eyes unto Heaven, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible marvels, may continually travel to surmount these perceived Heavens, and to find out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. *Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it self in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet: It is the Light (saith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it self communicateth its goodness and beauty unto all. Of which, Ovid out of Orpheus:*

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus, Mundi oculus.*

The world discerns it self, while I the World behold,
By me the longest years, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly, If we may behold in any creature, any one spark of that eternal fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightness, the same in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this Light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa; and the Light, by Hermes, named Lux sancta; and Christ our Saviour said to be that Light which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimity, and purity, this is also true, that God is neither a mind, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. *Deus profecto non mens est, at vero ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa quæ spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa quæ lumen existit: God (saith Hermes in Poemandro) certainly is not a mind, but the cause that the mind hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.*

So then the Mafs and Chaos being first created, void, dark, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickened; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Ayr, which God illightened: the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same divine virtue) brought forth the bud of the herb that feedeth feed, &c. And for a mean and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those several species, which the Earth (being made fruitful by the Spirit) produced, and with motion began the time and times succeeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and evaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters, separate above this Extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, or expansum (for so Vatablus, Regimius, and Juvius turn it) are not the Crystalline Heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilus Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against this infancie. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the ayr above us, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia (which Montanus writeth Rakiagh) and Sbamajim, being indifferently taken for the heaven and for ayr, and more properly for the ayr and Ether, then for the heavens, as the best Hebricians understand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab inferiori crassius diducunt, inter seque dissident, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and gross matters: and the waters above the firmament, exprest in the word Majim, arc in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the ayr, or in the uppermost region of the same.

And that the word Heaven is used for the Ayr, the Scriptures every where witness; as in the blessings of Joseph, and in the 104. Psalm: * By these Springs shall the fowl of the Heaven dwell; and upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heaven; and in Isaac's blessing to Jacob; God give thee therefore of the dew of Heaven: and in Deuteronomy the 11. But the land whither you go to possess it, is a land that drinketh water of the rhyne of Heaven; and in Job, Who hath ingendered the frosts of Heaven; and in S. Matthew, Behold the Fowls of Heaven, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Testament throughout, is the word Heaven very oft used for Ayr, and taken also hyperbolically for any great Height, as, Let us build us a Tower, whose top may reach to Heaven &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his own words be these; *Et vocavit Deus firmamentum celum. Hæc appellatio alii quidem proprie accommodatur, hinc autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heaven: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is to the Starry Heaven) but to this (that is, to the firmament dividing the waters) it is impoed by similitude.* And if there were no other proof, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayr, and not the Heaven, the words of Moses in the eighth verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth verse, make it manifest: for in the eighth verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which divided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the twentieth verse he calleth the Firmament of Heaven; Ayr; in these words, And let the Fowl fly upon the earth in the open firmament of Heaven. And what use there should be of this ycie, or crystalline, or waterie Heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase; though in very truth, instead of this help, it would add an unmeasurable greatnes of circle, whereby the swiftness of that first Moveable would exceed all possibility of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought ought to be held to impossibilities: and faith it self (which surmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible conductor the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and understanding. Now that this supposed first Moveable, turneth in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can believe mens imagination, apprehend it; for I cannot. But of these many Heavens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius; and of this waterie Heaven, Basilius Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroldus, in his second Book and sixth chapter. For my self, I am perswaded, that the waters called, the waters above the Heavens, are but the clouds and waters engendred in the uppermost ayr.

A Conclusion, repeating the summe of the worke in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternity. First, he created the matter of all things: and in the first three dayes he distinguished, and gave to every nature his proper form; the form of levitie to that which ascended; to that which descended, the form of gravity: for he separated light from darkness, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the firmament into one place. In the last three dayes, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sun, Moon, and Starrs; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Ayr with Fowl, and the Sea with Fish, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their Species, and kindesto Creatures vegetative and growing, their Seeds in themselves; for he created all things, that they might have their being: and the generations of the world are preserved.

That Nature, is no Principium per se; nor Form, the giver of being; and of our ignorance how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

ANd for this working-power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into every creature, having no other selfe-ability, then a Clock, after it is wound up by a mans hand, hath. Those therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any first or sole power, have therein no other understanding, then such a one hath who, looking into the Stern of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helm and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute virtue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the judgment, which also directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all else, that by the virtue of the first act, all Agents work whatsoever they work: Virtute primi actus, agent agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the mind of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the ears, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the ears, &c. and yet it is the mind only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sun, by the Starrs, by Nature or infused properties, and by men as by several Organs, several effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they have received from the head and fountain of the Universal. For as it is Gods infinite power, and everywhere-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the Sun power to draw up vapours, to be made clouds; clouds to contain rain, and rain to fall: so all second and instrumental causes together with Nature it self, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether silent, virtueless, and dead: of which excellently Orpheus, Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthful green. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable virtues which God hath given to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all His works in their virtues prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, have taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or express it, ever enrich his own understanding with any certain truth, or ever edifie others (not foolishly by selfe-flattery) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wilddom of the Philosophers) Si facultas inveniendo veritatis huic studio subjaceret, atque nunc inven-

*123, cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingenii in ejus inquisitione contriti, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he), were means to find out the truth, it had ere this bin found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits have been worn out in the inquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. Nam si de unâ re præcisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessaria haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosphers were ignorant in Nature, and the waies of her working; so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Phisical form. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take conference, it hath not been taught, neither are these forms (saith a learned Author) anything, si ex ea exprimitur potentia, que nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be subjectum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the form, it is hard to conceive: for to make form, which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, divine and humane: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference between matter and form, then between heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of rational consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Lovers, who by certain Scholastical distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prove a false eternity of the World, I think it far safer to affirm with Saint Augustine, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom, whatsoever is natural proceedeth, of what kind or estimation soever: from whence are the seeds of all forms, and the forms of all seeds and their motions; A quo est omnis species, a quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cujusque generis est, cujusque affirmationis est; a quo sunt semina formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum atque formarum. And thus much Averrois is forced to confess. For all forms (saith he) are, in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionysius.*

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starrs have great influence: and that their operations may diversely be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more general, and universally powerful then it is, by giving it Dominion over the mind of man, and over his will, of which Ovid, and Juvenal:

Ratio fatum vincere nulla valet. Servis regna dabunt, captivis Fata triumphos.

Juv. Id. 7. 201.

'Gainst Fate no counsell can prevail.
Kingdoms to Slaves by Destinie,
To Captives triumphs given be.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after Basilius, of them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillanists, the Bardisaniis, and others, as Basilius, Augustine, and Thomas have observed: But that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Aristotle the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestial Orbs; unchangeably working in inferior bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things which a rational mind doth not order nor direct. Ptolemy, Seneca, Democritus, Epictetus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inevitable necessity; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoque nostrum fatus est Deus) and the destinie lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starrs are instruments of far greater use, then to give an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunset: it being manifest, that the diversity of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hot and cold, are not so uncertainly by the Sun and Moon alone, who alway keep one and the same course; but that the Starrs have also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given virtues to Springs and Fountains, to cold Earth, to Plants and Stones, Minerals, and to the excremental parts of the baseliest living creatures, why should we rob the beautiful Starrs of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent

nent beauty and magnitude, we may not think, that in the treasury of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every Star) a peculiar virtue and operation; as every herb, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to cover and shadow her dusty face, but otherwise for the use of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those uncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorn it; but for Instruments and Organs of his divine Providence, so far as it hath pleased his just will to determine. Origen upon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the Stars are not causes (meaning per chance binding causes;) but are as open Books, wherein are contained and set down all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I believe well, and this saying of Syracides with all: That there are hid yet greater things than these be, and we have seen but a few of his works. And though, for the capacity of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and uttermost virtues of herbs and plants, which under our selves low and set, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestial bodies. For hardly (saith Solomon) can we discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find we out those things that are before us: Who can then investigate the things that are in Heaven? Multum est, de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heavens we do not bind God to his creatures, in this supposed necessity of Destiny; so on the contrary, we do not rob those beautiful creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes deposed God of his Prerogative, or had God himself constrained the mind and will of man to impious acts by any celestial inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some, were justifiable; of whom S. Augustine, Impia perversitate in malis factis redissimè reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius Antorem Syderum, quam commissorem scelerum; Where we wicked them of evil deeds, they again with wicked perverseness urge, that rather the Author and Creator of the Stars, than the doer of the evil, is to be accused.

But that the Stars and other celestial bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora celestia (saith Damasene) constitunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & dispositiones. The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in us habits, complexiones, and dispositions; for the body (though Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the mind, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in virtues; for those of cholerick complexions are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the Mind hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonless mind, I am created: For all those which were revolted mortal, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites; over all which, celestial bodies (as instruments and executives of Gods providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell; for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them; so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by virtue and piety prepared, putteth himself altogether under the power of his sensual appetite: Vincitur satum si resistas, vincit si contempseris, Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it; if thou neglect it, it conquereth.

But that either the Stars or the Sun have any power over the minds of men immediately, it is absurd to think, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the body's temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilibus corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sun (saith S. Augustine) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moveth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio, The Sun is good to serve, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose.) And S. Augustine, Dens regit inferiora corpora per superiora, God ruleth the bodies below by those above; but he avoucheth not, that superior bodies have rule over mens minds, which are incorporeal.

But howsoever we are by the Stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation; and Aristotle himself confesseth, that the Heavens do not always work their effects in inferior bodies no more then the signs of rain and wind do always come to pass. And it is divers times seen, that paternal virtue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in juvenis Patrum virtus, in the young Offspring (saith Horace) the Fathers virtue is, and so the contrary, Pa-

trum vitia: and herein also there is often found an interchange; the Sons of virtuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men to virtue.

Egregia est soboles scelcrato nata parente:

A worthy son is born of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much letteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as Education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing up, may fashion anew and reform them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reins being let loose) the continual fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute men, may not corrupt and deform. Vessels will ever retain a favour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanse the mind once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet favour of virtue first received, when the mind was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the Stars incline the will) and a virtuous education do happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding virtuous or vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: for as the seeds of virtue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsel produce better and more beautiful fruit, then the strength of Self-nature and Kind could have yielded them; so the plants apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into weeds, by being set in a soyl sutable, and like themselves, are made more unfavourable and filled with poison. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus Astrorum, quemadmodum Agricola terra naturam; A wise man assisteth the work of the Stars, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyl. And Ptolemy himself confesseth thus much, Sapiens, & omnia sapientis Medici, dominabuntur Astris; A wise man and the omniscient art of a wise Physician shall prevail against the Stars. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Stars, as he did the rest of the Universal; whose influences may be called his reserved and unwritten Laws. But let us consider how they bind: even as the Laws of men do; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Laws decreed, that a Thief and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magistrates (the Stars of Kings) executed accordingly; yet these Laws do not deprive Kings of their natural or religious compassion, or bind them without prerogative, to such a severe execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberty to judgement, power, or conscience: the Law in his own nature, being no other then a dead Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) do sometimes for causes to themselves known, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves; it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himself, which his Substitutes enjoy; God being mercy, goodness, and charity it self. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil, had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his own creatures truly) hath assured us, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and Desires may not make frustrate and break asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Destiny, though depending upon eternal power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himself should in a kind have shut up himself therein; How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. Augustine) left altogether without hope.

And if this strength of the Stars were so transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so believeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other, would thereby be deposed of all worship, reverence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised us the reward of well-doing, which Christ himself claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do;) and the same God, who hath threatened unto us the sorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the Destinies or Influences of the Stars, or subject our souls to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plato, that the Stars were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something less then their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God virtuelless: so I think that we derogate from His eternal and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them the same dominion over our immortal souls, which they have over all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the Souls of men loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it self, whereof the Suns clarity, and that of the Stars, is by Plato called but a shadow.

 Plat. pol. 6. Lumen est umbra Dei, Deus est lumen luminis; Ficin. in l. Light is the shadow of Gods brightness, who is
 7. pol. the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destiny, together with Providence, Prefcience, and Preadefinition, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two;
 for every man hath not observed it, though all learned men have.

§. XII.

Of Prefcience.

Prefcience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greeks call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speak of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prefcience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selves fore-know, except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prefcience of God (as it is Prefcience only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impole any necessity, or bind. For in that we fore-know that the Sun will rise, and set; that all men born in the World shall die again; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring, Summer, and Harvest; and that according to the several seeds that we sow, we shall reap several sorts of grain; yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in us bind or constrain the Sun to rise and set, or men to die; for the causes (as men persuade themselves) are otherwise manifest and known to all. The eye of man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and knives, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such things are in their own natures. And again out of the same Author; Divina providentia rebus gene- randis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia evenirent ex necessitate, præmia bonorum, & pæna malorum periret; Divine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all come to pass of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of evil.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

Now Providence (which the Greeks call Pronoia) is an intellectual knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not only behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prefcience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the past; Knowledge of the present; and Care of the future: and we our selves account such a man for provident, as, remembering things past, and observing things present, can by judgment, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every where teach us; Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Christ himself and his Apostles assure us hereof; and besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pytha- goras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledg the Providence of God; yea the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any peril whatsoever, though death threaten do manifestly present it self.

The places of Scripture proving Providence, are so many, both in general and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Sing unto God (saith David) which covereth the Heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the grass to grow upon the Mountains, which giveth the beasts their food, and feedeth the young Raven that cries: All these wait upon thee, that thou mayest give them food in due season: And thou shalt drink of the River Cleareth (saith God to Eliab) and I have command- ed the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowl of the air, they sow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea, all the hairs of your head are numbered: And S. Peter, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his judgments are written, saith David.

God therefore, who is every where present, Who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the righteous, and his compassionate against them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on,

as if he had transferred his power to any other; for it is contrary to his own word, Glo- riam meam alteri non dabo, I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is every where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods universal Providence is seen in his creatures. The Father provideth for his children: beasts and birds and all livings, for their young ones. If Providence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Universal: and if there be a natural loving care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Universal:
Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum universi (saith Plato:) Amor Dei est modus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobile sustentaculum, ac universe machinæ fundamentum: The love of God is the perpetual knot, and link or chain of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the Universal.
 God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only provide for all, and sustain all; so as to absolute power; to every where presence; to perfect goodness; to pure and divine love; this attribute transcendent ha-bility of Providence is only proper and belonging.

§. XIV.

Of Preadefinition.

Now for Preadefinition, we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Prefcience, then in this; that Prefcience only fore-seeth; Providence fore-seeth and careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, even from the brightest Angels of Heaven to the unworthiest Worms of the Earth: and Preadefinition (as it is used specially by Di-vines) is only of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their salvation properly, in the common use of Divines; or perdition, as some have used it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Eberhardus Theologus, and others, take the word Preadefinition more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity. Divers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes:
 among whom Saint Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, useth these words, Quarum est una, que prædestinata est in æter-num regnare cum Deo, altera æternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo: Whereof one is it, which is prædestinated to reign for ever with God, but the other is to undergo everlasting torment with the Devil; for according to Novinus Marcellus,

Destinare est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant Writers, as Calvin, Cal. in c. 9.
Beza, Bucanus, Dancus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising,
 I leave them to the Divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, Qui in factis Dei ra- tionem non videt, infirmitatem suam confide-rans, cur non videat, rationem videri; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And again, with S. Augustine, Occulta esse causa potest, injusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Preadefinition may be, unjust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

I Astly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subsequent to Gods Providence, and seeing that the Stars have no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but, as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artifi- cium Dei Organum, The art, or artificial Organ of God: and Cusanus, Divini præcepti instru-mentum; The instrument of the divine precept:
 we may then with better reason reject that kind of Idolatry, or God of fools, called, Fortu- næ or Chancæ; a Goddels, the most reverenced, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient: for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pansanius witnesseth in his Meleagria. The Greeks call her Tyche, signifying a relative being, or beiding, so as before Homer's time this great Lady was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune; yet afterward the grew to great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdoms, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things; relishing the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possession thereof miserable; valuing the folly of the most foolish, by making the success properous: innumerable as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her pastimes: of which Palladius, Vita ho- minum indus fortune est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprizes guided by ill counsels, have equal success to those by the best judgment conducted, therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience; whereof Athenians:

Longissimè

Longissime à sapientia Fors disjacet, Sed multa perficit tamen similitudo;

From Wisedom Fortune differs far,
And yet in works most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the successe of human actions and endeavours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could be given, then was it attributed to Fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato, Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cujus causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing ever came to pass under the Sun, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem Inferioris, sed non præter intentionem Superioris (to wit, the ordinance of Gods;) and therefore (saith Adelanchthon) Quod poete Fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of Murder, He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, If he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomy the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Ax from the helve, whereby another is slain, was the work of God himself; we in our phrase attribute this accident, to Chance or Fortune: and in Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the Lord; so as that which seemeth most casual and subject to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, That the same power which they called Animam mundi; The soul of the World, was no other then that incomprehensible Wisdom, which we express by the name of God, governing every Being as well in heaven as in earth; to which Wisdom and Power they sometime gave the title of Necessity or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appear unto us no certain causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis the first Book: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by divers terms, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diversly.

But it may be objected, That if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and evil in men, but an idle voice, whereby we express successe; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fools? That riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernel; and so many learned, virtuous, and valiant men wear out their lives in poor and dejected estates? In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the times wherein we live: for whosoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withal an honest and open heart and loving truth; if Princes, or those that govern, endure no other discourse then their own fallacies: then, I say, such an one, whose virtue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheel; which kind of deserving well and receiving ill, we always fallily charge Fortune withal. For whosoever shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not just; the General of an Army, that he is not valiant; and great Ladies that they are not fair; shall never be made a Counsellor, a Captain, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such an one hath no estate in his prosperity; but he must also change with the successe, if he be of contrary qualities; fall with the tyde of the time, and alter form and condition, as the Estate or the Estate's Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attain to honour and riches, but by such an observant slavish course? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeited kind of wondering at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are virtues, and all their dusky actions crystalline, have yet in all ages prospered equally with the most virtuous, if not exceeded them. For, according to Menander, Omnis infans, arrogantia & plausus capitur; Every fool is wonne wonne with his own pride, and others flattering applause: so as whosoever will live altogether out of himselfe, and study other mens humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and virtue (except the season wherein he liveth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodness, fruitful) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to war or contend in vain against the nature of times wherein he liveth: for such an one is often the author of his own misery; but best it were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Bishop of that age, out of Ovid, while the Arian Heresie raged:

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.
While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man furie's gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world began not a man of more reputed Judgment) had followed the counsel of his Brother Quintus, Potuisse (saith Petrarch) in lætulo suo mori, potuisset integro cadavere sepeliri; He might then have died the death of nature, and been with an untorn and undiscovered body buried; for, as Petrarch in the same place noteth Quid stultius quam desperantem, præsertim de effectu libris perpetuis implicari?

CHAP. II.

Of Man's estate in his first Creation, and of God's rest.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

The creation of all other creatures being finished, the heavens adorned, and the earth replenished, God said, Let us make man in our own Image, according to our likeness.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods works to us known: *Ingens miraculum homo; Man is the greatest wonder (saith Plato out of Mercurius) Nature ardentissime artificum. The artificial work of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellency external, but in respect of his internal form, both in the Nature, Qualities, and other Attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence, immortal, and spiritual; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.*

What more foolish then for him that despairs especially of the effect, to be entangled with endless contentions? Whosoever therefore will set before him Machiavel's two marks to shoot at (to wit) Riches, and Glory, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble; for as he who first devised to add sayls to rowing vessels, did either in proportion them as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all winds and storms, or else he sometime or other perished by his own invention: so that man which prizeth virtue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoyle and strike his sayls, as the divers natures of calmes and storms require, must cut his sayls and his cloth of mean length and breadth, and content himself with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a mean and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or whatsoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishness) of man hath found out: let us resolve with S. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diversities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

*Sanctus his animal, mentisq; capacis alae, Deerat adhuc, & quod dominari in cætera possit:
Natus homo est.*

More holy then the rest, and understanding more,
A living creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoolmen, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceive, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostom, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Ut sicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus; & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus esset, super faciem totius terre: unus igitur, unum fecit, qui unitatis ejus haberet imaginem; That is God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kind should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should have the Image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power; it is written Dominantini in the plural number; and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that Man is said to be after the Image of God in respect of his immortal soul only: because as God is invisible, so the soul of man is invisible; as God is immortal and incorporeal, so is the soul of Man immortal and incorporeal; and as there is but one God which governeth the world, so but one soul which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, so is the soul of man wholly in every part of the body: Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soul is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men deny that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, like the Aristotelians in the world shall never prove. These and the like arguments do the Jews make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The School-men resemble the Mind or Soul of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Mind there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Understanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of real differences, are but one Mind: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diverse; and again, they distinguish between Imaginem Dei, and ad Imaginem Dei, and spin into small threads with subtle distinctions, many times the plainness and sincerity of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolveth the purest gold. Vistorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantial, but not the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declarativum; A word declaring quality in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the Image and Similitude do greatly differ, so the sinful soul doth not therefore leave to be the Image of God; but it hath not his Similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sin, the perfection of this image is lost in man; and in his Retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoever the School-men and others distinguish, or whatsoever the Fathers conceive; sure I am, that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the Image, which Vistorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we have borne the image of the earthy, so shall we bear the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scripture, that the words Image and similitude were used but in one sense, and in this place the better to express each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himself in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, ever conceived. Now as S. Paul useth the word (Image) for both: so Saint James useth the word (Similitude) for both, in these words: Therewith blest we God even the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegance in writing, to make some difference: as where he writeth, Constituimus imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inveniri; we confess that this image is found in eternity, but his similitude in manners, that is in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the mind; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi veri possit esse imago aliqua, in qua similitudo supra non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: is no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The very words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let us make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us: and in the next Verse following, God himself maketh it plain; for there he useth the word (Image) only as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, the word (Similitude) of the fifth Chapter, in the first Verse of the used again by it self, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul, Coloss. the third, calleth the Image; but on (saith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syriacides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may believe S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoolmen, then it is as manifest as words can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same; for S. Paul useth both the words directly in one sense. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to prove, that Man formed after the image of God, both in body and mind: Nulla pars in homine, quae non fuerit hujus imaginis particeps; No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating God image; for God said, Let us make man according to our own image. But the soul alone is not man, but the Hypostasis, or whole Man compounded of body and soul. The body of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body, must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his own objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche. As when a man is called a mortal man, yet is not the whole man mortal, but the body only: so when God said, Let us make man after our image, he meant the soul of man, and not the body of earth and dust: Maledictus qui Deitatem ad hominis lineamentum refert (saith S. Augustine). Cursed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of mans body: Deus enim non est humane forme particeps, neque corpus humanum divine (saith Philo); God is not partaker of humane form, nor humane body of the form divine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow: Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition; for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Ambrosian morphite, against the very essence and Majesty of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine understanding then these gross Heretics: Ad similitudinem Dei proprius accedebat humana virtus, quam figurat; The virtue which is in man (saith he) came nearer the similitude of God then the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, invisible, and most simple; God is a just God, God is Merciful, God is Charity it self, and (in a word) Goodness it self, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himself to teach us, and to make us know of himself. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his unexcogitable power and perfectness? Certainly, not in Dominion alone; for the Devil is said to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdom of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father: Neither because man hath an immortal soul, and therein the faculties of Memory, Understanding, and Will; for the Devils are also immortal, and participate those faculties, being called Demoniaci, because scientes of knowledge and subtilty: Neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: For who have rebelled against God? Who have made gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owls, yea, even of shameful parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet do I not condemn the opinion of S. Chrysostom and Ambrose, as touching Dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Justice and Piety; for God did not only make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowls of Heaven (or of the air) and over the Beasts of the Field; But God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed Kings to govern them, and Judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude Reason, as it is the ability of Understanding. For I do not conceive, that Ireneus did therefore call Man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale only; but that he understood it better, with Sybillas: Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens; Man that is endued with right reason is said to resemble God (that is) by right reason to know and confess God his Creator, and the same God to serve, love, and obey: and therefore said S. Augustine (who herein came nearer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente; God made man in respect of the intellect after his own image and similitude; and Reynertus, Homo, quid habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei; Man was made after the image of God, in mind, or, in that he hath a mind.

§. II.

Of the Intellectual mind of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sin.

BUT Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is, forma vel natura hominis. The form or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principal strength of the mind, or fouls, called anus gl' perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetual contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called Intellectus diuinus, intellectus contemplatiuus, & anima contemplatiua. A diuine understanding; and an intellectu or mind contemplatiue. Eft anima mens noſtra (ſaith Cuiusius) noſt comprehendendi; & totum virtuale eſt omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus conpoſitum: Our intellectual mind (ſaith he) is a power of comprehending; euen the whole, that is in this kind powerful, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: unto which Mercurius attributeth ſo much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he eſteemeth it to be the very eſſence of God (which was alſo the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwiſe ſeparate from God (ſaith he) then the light from the Sun: for this Mens or understanding (ſaith Mercurius) eſt Deus in hominibus, ſ. eſt Deus in mens; or rather, (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For, as the Sun is not of the ſame eſſence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illi- ghtened, and an illumination created; ſo is this Mens or understanding in men, not of the eſſence of Gods infinite understanding, but a power and faculty of our ſouls the pureſt; or, the humen anima rationalis, by the true and eternal light illi ghtened. And this Mens, others call Animam anime, The ſoul of the ſoul, or, with S. Auguſtine, the eye of the ſoul, or receptacle of ſapience and diuine Knowledge, Que amorent ſapientie tanquam diuitem ſequitur, Which followeth after the love of ſapience as her guide (ſaith Philos;) between which and reaſon; between which and the mind, called animas between which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference: Reaſon, is that faculty by which we iudge and diſcours; Animia, by which we liue. Hereof it is ſaid, Animia corpus animat, id eſt, viueſcit; or, The ſoul is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueth it life; for death is the ſeparation of body and ſoul; and the ſame ſtrength (ſaith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the ſame hath this Animia, or mind, or ſoulin Man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Baſil agreeeth, which called this Mens, or diuine understanding, Perſpicacem anime partem. The perceiving part of the mind, or, The light by which the ſoul diſcerneth: Dormientium mens, non anima, ſopit; or, In ſuoribus mens extinguitur, anima manet: In men that ſleep it is this (mens,) or understanding, and not the mind or ſoul, which reſteth, during which time it is but habitual in wife men, and in mad men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the soul; for mad men do live, though distract.

Therefore this word being often used for the Soul giving life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted mind, in stead of a broken understanding: which word (Mind) we use also for Opinion, as, I am of this mind, or, that mind: and sometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, He is of an honest mind, or, a man of a just mind: sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mind's sake: and Aristotle sometimes useth this word (Mens) for the phantasm, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without discourse: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels, and Intelligences: but as it is used in the proper signification, including both the understanding agent and possible, it is described to be, A pure, simple, substantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large, thus; A part or particle of the Soul, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be delivered, as, external from that which is mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius; Animæ qd̄ imago mentis, mens imago Dei, Deus menti præf, mens animæ, anima corporis; The Soul (meaning that which giveth life) is the image of this understanding, or Mens; and this (Mens) or understanding is the Image of God. God is Prefect or Ruler over this understanding, this understanding over the Soul, and this Soul over the body. This division and distinction out of the Platonicks and Peripateticks, I leave to the Reader to judge of. That Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Martinius Ficinus in his ninth Book of the Soul's immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanchinus doth not differ from Ficinus in words; for (saith he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organum; tanquam medio, per quod intelligat: quamquam eget objecto in quod intuat, & ex quo intellectum concipiat. Here autem objectum sunt phantasmata, seu verum a sensibus perceptum similitudina ad phantasmata prolata: To exercise the faculty of understanding, the mind of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a mean, by which it may understand: but it needeth an object, whereto to look, and whereto to conceive the act of understanding. This object are the phantasms, or the resemblances of things received from the sense, and carried to the phantse. But in effect, his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantfic, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his understanding and mind, as colours are to the sight; whence it followeth, that the imagination or phantasy itself is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing: and as this is an Organum, so that. Of this question, How the mind in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body.

I beseech the Reader to a most grave and learned Discourse in the last Reply of M. D. Bilfon, late Bishop of Winchester, unto Henry Jacob. Howsoever the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the mind it self, by which we live, nor in respect of our souls simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the Image of God. But most fairly may we resemble our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty, which is never separate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the Mind or Soul, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God: whose words are these, Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sit meminit Mens, loque intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of S. Augustine) sed quia potest meminsse, intelligere, ac diligere cum a quo facta est, (That is The Mind (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, understandeth, and loveth it self; but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear Augustin; Hom ad Imaginem & Similitudinem Dei factus est. Peccatum vero Imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & immitem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiis affectibus immergit: Man was made after the Image and Similitude of God, but Sin hath deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortality, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it self, nor in all these joyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the Soul, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Original righteousness, most perfectly infused by God into the Mind and Soul of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seal of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which, joyned to the Soul, is a part of the Effential Constitution of our proper species) but from the bountiful grace of the Lord of all goodness, who breathed life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunk of Dust and Clay, the inimitable habili-ty of his own Piety and Righteousness.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) do those that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandments they exercise the Office or Magistracy to, which they are called, and sincerely walk in the ways of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this Image, as they fear, love, and serve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruise and deface his Seal by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obfuscate fins. For the unjust mind cannot bear the Image of God, feeling God is Justice it self; The bloud-thirsty hath it not, for God is Charity and Mercy it self; Falsehood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soul, together with God: and to be short, there is no likelihood between pure light and black darkness, between beauty and deformity, or between righteousness and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this Image of Gods goodness, which the sensual souls of Beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude natural more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and dure-les pleasures of this Stage-play World, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of God's Wisdom, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed eyes to our souls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest Heavens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Mind and Soul, to contemplate the ever-during Glory, and term-les Joy, prepared for those which retain the Image and Similitude of their Creator, preserving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousness, and Holiness, as faith S. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by S. Augustine,

S. Ambrose Augustine, with whom S. Ambrose joyneth, that by sin, the perfection of the Image is lost; and not the Image it self: both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two ways; for, either it is considered according to natural gifts, and consisteth therein; namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sin, then the very reasonable or understanding nature, &c. is lost, (for sin doth not abolish and take away these natural gifts:;) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernatural gifts, namely, of divine Grace and heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the natural Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out, and destroyed by Sin.

§. III.

Of our base and frail Bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal Soul.

THE external man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or (according to the signification of the word, Adam) of Adam, of red Earth, or ex limo terre, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex glaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguisima & mollissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth, or Dust, God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

That, man was formed of Earth and Dust did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble fear he called unto God, to save Sodom: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speak, I that am but dust and ashes: And, In these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, do our souls inhabit, according to Job. And though our own eyes do every where behold the sudden and refutable assaults of Death, and Nature assure us by never-failing experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times upon the Earth have neither certainty nor durability; that our Bodies are but the Anvils of pain and diseases, and our Minds the Hives of unnumbered cares, sorrows, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts against which Envy and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappiness of our condition, and the dark ignorance which covereth the eyes of our understanding, that we only prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassal and Slave of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cost-away leisure) the imprisoned immortal Soul, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortal parts of virtuous men: seeing Gods Justice in the one, and his goodness in the other, is exercised for evermore, as the ever-living Subjects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great account? Never while we have one vanity left us to spend: we plead for Titles, till our breath fail us; dig for Riches, while our strength enable us; exercise Malice, while we can revenge; and then when time hath beaten from us both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it self hatcheth the house of old age, we remember with Job, that we must go the way Job 10. 11. 17. 13. from whence we shall not return, and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark; And then, I say, looking over-late into the bottom of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked up from us all our lives,) we behold therein the fearful Images of our actions past, and withal this terrible Inscription: That God will bring every work into judgment, that man hath done under the Sun.

But what examples have ever moved us? what persuasions reformed us? what threatenings have us afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaid before us, we hear what is promised and threatened: but the World's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds, and these betraying lights, (with which we only see) do neither look up towards term-less joys, nor down towards endless sorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing else at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Martinus Vitor:

Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil denique morbi Egerunt, finimus qui nunc sumus; iisque periculis Tentati: nihilo meliores reddimur unquam; Sub vitis nullo culparum sine manentes.

Diseases, famine, enemies, in us no change have wrought, What erst we were, we are; still in the same snare caught: No time can our corrupted manners mend; In Vice we dwell, in Sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal Souls herein; for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his Laws and Precepts, Frustra sperant qui sic de misericordia cordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, saith Bernard, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercy.

§. IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his creation.

IN this frame and carcass God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living Soul: (that is) God gave a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soul spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men use, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortality into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as love and fear him. The Spirit of God (saith Elisha in Job) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life: In qua sententia (saith Rabanus) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, non fortè putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labiis suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut vivere possit & spiraculum vite habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tue fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est, juxta consuetudinem, quæ solent homines operari) loquutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggariness of carnal sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should think, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with jaws or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the Spirit of life: for the Prophet also when he saith; Thy hands have made me, speak this Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custom which men use in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnal sense? By this breath was infused into man, both life and soul, and therefore this (Soul) the Philosophers call Animam, quæ vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith Job: and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soul of man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken; according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall return to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soul; as when Stephen cried unto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum; Lord Jesus receive my spirit: and in S. John, And Jesus bowed his head and gave up the Ghost; or Spirit; (which was) that his life and soul left his body dead. And that the immortal soul of man differeth from the souls of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our own Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life, so that they again be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken, but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into Man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, return again to God that gave it.

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or model, or brief Story in the Universal: in whom God concluded the Creation, and work of the World, and whom he made the last, and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally ended with a divine understanding, by which he might contemplate, and serve his Creator, after whose Image he was formed, and endowed with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the World, and all other Gods Creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living natures, (to wit) Angelical, Rational, and Brutal; giving to Angels an intellectual, and to Beasts a sensual nature, he vouchsafed unto Man, both the intellectual of Angels, the sensitive of Beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto man: and therefore (saith Gregory Nazianzen) Homo est utriusque naturæ vinculum. Man is the bond and chain which tieth together both Natures: and because in the little frame of man's body there is a representation of the Universal, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Quod igitur hominem factum, velut alterum mundum, in brevi magnam, atque exiguam totum, in terris statuit; God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World; the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust, was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heavy and lumpish: the bones bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rocks and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which Ovid:

Ovid. Met. Inde genus durum sumus, experientisq; laborum, Et documenta damus, qua sumus origine nati:

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is,
Enduring pain and care, Approving, that our bodies of a stony nature are.

His blood, which disperseth it self by the branches of veins through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by Brooks and Rivers over all the earth; his breath to the Air, his natural heat to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it self, which, stirred up by the heat of the Sun, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth: Our radical Moisture, Oyl, or Balsamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertility of the Earth; the hairs of mans body, which adorn, or overshadow it, to the grass, which covereth the upper face and skin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering, and unstable clouds, carried every where with uncertain winds; our eyes to the light of the Sun and Moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sun's heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the stalks; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (formerly called Mens, and that which always looketh upwards) to those intellectual Natures, which are always present with God; and lastly, our immortal souls (while they are righteous) are by God himself beautified with the title of his own Image and Similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man just, or good, or righteous (for, In Angelis deprehensa est futilitas, Behold, He found folly in his Angels, saith Job); yet, with such a kind of difference, as there is between the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodness in men: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called Man, the Image and Similitude of his own Righteousness. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Universal (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the four Complexions resemble the four Elements, and the seven Ages of man the seven Planets; Whereof, our infancy is compared to the Moon, in which we seem only to live and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the days of Love, Desire, and Vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seek honour and victory, and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take account of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our understanding; the last and seventh, to Saturn, wherein our days are sad, and over-cast, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loss which can never be repaired, that of all our vain passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made unfociable to others, we become a burthen to our selves: being of no other use, then to hold the riches we have from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we pass on unto with many sighs, groans, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull business of a wretched life; towards which we always travel both sleeping and waking: neither have those beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death, whose doors lie open at all hours, and to all persons. For this Tide of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual Ebb and falling Stream, but never floweth again: our Leaf once fallen, springeth no more; neither doth the Sun or the Summer adorn us again, with the garments of new Leaves and Flowers.

Redditur arboribus florens revoirentibus ætas, Ergo non homini, quod fuit ante, redit.

To which I give this sense.

The Plants and Trees made poor and old
By Winter envious,
The Spring-time bounteous
Covers again from shame and cold:
But never man repair'd again
His youth and beauty lost,
Though Art, and care, and cost,
Do promise Nature's help in vain.

And

And of which,

CATULLUS, EPIGRAM. 53.

*Soles occidere & redire possunt:
Nobis semel occidit brevis lux,
Nox est perpetua una dormienda.*

The Sun may set and rise:
But we contrariwise
Sleep after our short light
One everlasting night.

For if there were any baiting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in natural living things, and as the sap and joyce, wherein the life of Plants is preserved, doth evermore ascend or descend; so is it with the life of man, which is always either increasing towards ripeness and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottenness and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himself.

These be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, unto whom God in his creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things, with one only Prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortal and immortal Life, a nature celestial and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himself, to be his own Guide, his own Workman, and his own Painter, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased, and make election of his own form. God made man in the beginning (saith Sirach) and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Such was the liberality of God, and man's felicity: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonless, brought with them into the World (saith Lucifer), and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the Nature, which they could not change; and the supernal Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the sensual of Beasts, the rational of Man, and the intellectual of Angels; whereof which soever he took pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should futrely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Asclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagoreans, and antient Poets, wherein it was fained, that men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutality, from Virtue to Vice, from Meekness to Cruelty, and from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other creatures did those Antients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortal men; as by Serpents were signified Deceivers; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruel men; by Swine, Men given over to lust and sensuality; by Wolves, ravening, and greedy men; which also S. Matthew resembleth to false Prophets, Matthew 23. inwardly they are ravening Wolves; by the images of stones and flocks, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, ungrateful Men: of which S. John Baptist, O ye generation of Vipers, &c. Matthew 3.

§. VII.

Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universal created was exceeding good.

In this work of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse, With whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I work, but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and so to the rest of living creatures, to Plants and Flowers, their seeds in themselves; and commanded Man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their several kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good; not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not, the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of Good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whole simple purity and from so excellent a cause there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Ark contained, reserved by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that men should erre.

Concerning the first Habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, Gen. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgments have been in effect, as divers, among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestrial Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geography, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation; or, trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one Error is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things to observant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, than to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnorum virorum auctoritate perpassi, transmittimus; We pass over many gross errors, by the authority of great men led and persuaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I myself dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himself, GOD hath distributed unto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness: Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint Paul censured that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third Heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur, (saith Job) But where is wisdom found? and where is the place of understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens judgments (which inhabit in houses of Clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our salvation depended not.

§. II.

A recital of strange Opinions touching Paradise.

Now touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, Whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mystical, and allegorical, as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others, have affirmed; and that under the names of those four Rivers Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge, there were delivered unto us other mysteries and significations; as, that by the four Rivers were meant the four Cardinal Virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Ashk, and and Honey. This Allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Franciscus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis;) whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his fifth Book, fol. 338. the last Edition.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our souls: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the Soul or Mind; by Adam, Mens, or, Understanding; by Eve, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and evil, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the virtues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corinth. c. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestial and terrestrial Paradise; the one into which S. Paul was wrapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus was of opinion, that a Paradise had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two several places. First, upon this; Fill the earth, Gen. 10. Of which he gives this judgment. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominavini universis animalibus, subijcite terram, clarissimè docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus constam, sedem & hortum illum Adæ, & posteritatis future fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, do clearly shew, that the Universal earth, fit or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was,) was the garden and seat of Adam, and of his future posterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Ad's, Cap. 17. Apostolus ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum ideo factum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem terre: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Coropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar Garden; which place Coropius findeth near the River of Acefenus, in the Confinnes of India.

Tertullianus, Bonaventura, and Durandus make Paradise under the Equinoctial; and Pestellus, quite contrary, under the North-pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament onely, or else would have it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Air. Strabus, and Rabanus, were both sick of this vanity, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Peter Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins says of Philo Judeus, that he wondred, Quo malo genio affatus, By what evil Angel he was blown up into this error; so can I but greatly marvel at the learned men, who so grossly and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the points of the Compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea, or Canaan.

Noviomagus also upon Beda, De naturarum, believeth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountain from whence the four Rivers Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it possible, that these Rivers, of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountain, where it not out of the Fountain of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true local Paradise Eastward, in the Countrey of Eden.

To the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the Man whom he had made: and howsoever the vulgar translation, called Jerom's translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio, The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For, What sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a Garden in Pleasure, or, that a River went out of pleasure to water the Garden? But the Seventy Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, The Paradise of Eden; and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a Place, and for a Noun appellative: which Region, in respect of the fertility of the Soil, of the many beautiful Rivers and goodly Woods, and that the Trees (as in the Indies) do always keep their leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, Pleasantness, or delicacy; as the Spaniards call the Country, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, That as Florida was a Country, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a Region, called Pleasure, or Delicacy, for its pleasure or delicacy; and as Florida signifieth Flourishing; so Eden signifieth Pleasure: and yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choise seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the translation of the Seventy; to the ancient Greek Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory; and to the Rabins, as Ramban, Rabbi Solomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Severinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and let the word (Eastward) for ab initio; for Damascenus's own words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter constructus; Paradisus is a place marvellously planted by the hands of God in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of latter times, do both understand these words of Eden and of the East, contrary to the vulgar Translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which there are their own words: After this I will begin to speak of Paradise terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hac incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo constructum in regione

terre Orientalis, que dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen, apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus: Cham habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For Moses (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Country, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Perse, 16. Genesis, where we read, that Cham dwelt on the East border of Heden, Pererius endeavoureth to qualifie this Translation; for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the Creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, that although the Devil was said to be a Man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I think (referring my self to better judgment) the Devil was from the instant of his fall a Man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans Creation. And for conclusion, S. Hieron (if that be his translation) adviseth himself better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante Paradisum volup-tatis, Cherubin; and Pererius himself acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew, Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, a Cherubin. Becanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, only to the end to find Paradise upon the River of Ascesis; for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the Tree of knowledge of good and evil, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-Tree: which Conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custom of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradise (saith Damascenus): affirming, that we always pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Solomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their service and divine ceremonies, always towards the West, thereby to avoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Judea, yet it was West from Persia) and the serving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great, which way we turn our faces, so our hearts stand right, other then this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selves towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we have lost the Paradise on earth; so by Christ's death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestial, and the Kingdom of Heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other mystery in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, then to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Judea and Canaan: for the Scriptures always called the people of those Nations, the Sons of the East which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, and Persia: of which Ovid.

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabatheaq; regna recessit, Persidague, & radiis juga subdita matutinis.

The East wind with Aurora hath a bidding Amongst the Arabian and the Persian Hills, Whom Phaebus first salutes at his first rising.

And if it be objected, that Jeremy the Prophet, threatening the destruction of Jerusalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those Nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it self stood North from Jerusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giveth best satisfaction: for he useth the word From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est, (saith he) à prima orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that a principio, and ad Orientem, have the same signification: From the beginning and Eastward is all one; à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to return to the proof of this place, and that this story of Mankind was not Allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. and 9. Verse, in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meat, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam else-where as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why, is expressed: that he might dress it and keep it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withal) good for meat: which proveth that Paradise was a terrestrial Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of Allegorical construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a River; expressing also the Region, out of which this River sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Country near unto Churru in Mesopotamia, Ezekiel witnesseth.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words; Si Paradisus non est sensibilibus, non est etiam fons; si non est fons, non est flumen; si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gebon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates; non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non est Adam, non sunt homines, sed veritas jam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias revocantur; If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fountain, and then no river; if no river, then no such four heads or branches, and then not any such river, as Pison, or Gebon, Tigris, or Euphrates; no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called back into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome upon Daniel: *Contingant cornu deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegorie Legibus se debere subnere: Let the dotage of them be silent, who following shadows and images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth it self, and think that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Rivers, and the Trees, under the Rules of Allegory.*

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Story, is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth Verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third heaven, nor near the circle of the Moon, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmatical or mystical, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezekiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings, useth this speech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enovied him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated, to be terrestrial: for the Prophets Perf. 10.

Ezek. 17.

phets

phets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple style, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose, to take away all scruple from the incredulity of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecy) to be capt to fabulous inventions; and that if he had not described both the Region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Israelites, and others after them, would have misconstrued this Story of Man-kind. And, is it likely, there would have been so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodom and Gomorrah stood, (Sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unnatural sin purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise it self, exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and foil of far exceeding excellency.

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Aleion Gardens, as Justin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. And whence are their praises of the Elizian fields, but out of the Story of Paradise? To which also appertain those Verses of the Golden Age in Ovid:

Vix erat æternum; placidique tepentibus auris, Mullebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The joyfull Spring did ever last,
And Zephyrus did breed
Sweet flowers by his gentle blast,
Without the help of Seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and, after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sectators, did greatly enrich their Inventions, by venting the stolen Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conversions, as if they had been conceived out of their own speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we find what Region Heden, or Eden was; if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was divided into four Branches; together with the kingdoms of Havila, and Cush; and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceive that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegorical sense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Story being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententie: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt; (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corporal: a second of those, which conceive it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third Opinion, S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable judgment: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nomen sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est præditum; (that is) As man was created at one time, both sensible, and intelligible; so was this holy Grove, or Garden, to be taken both ways, and endured with a double form.

§. IV.

Why it should be needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUT it may be objected, that it is needless, and a kind of curiosity to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Story be necessary, then by the place proved, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceive that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted up as high as the Moon; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known World; from whence, Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would give any credit unto it. For what could seem more ridiculous than the report of such a place? and besides what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India; and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt; and these two Rivers so far distant, as

Secondly, if the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have been in some such Countrey, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had been performed in the Air, or no place certainly known: I assure my self, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should relie, or give place to the judgment of some Writers upon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no Fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the World so set by it self, and separated, as to hang in the Air under the circle of the Moon? or who so doltish to conceive, that from thence the four Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall down, and run under all the Ocean, and rise up again in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found? Which left any man think that I enforce, or strain to the worst, these are Peter Comestor's own words. Est autem locus amississimus, longo terra & maris tractu à nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeo elevatus, ut usque ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable zone, by a long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so, that it reacheth to the globe of the Moon.

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: *Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus, Paradisum multis sublimiore positum esse regione, atque hæc nostra extet terra, eoque fieri ut illinc per precipitium delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eoque impetu impulsæ præfigæ sub Oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rursus proflant ebulliantque in hoc à nobis culto orbe: quæ hanc hanc sententia: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region far raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to pass, that from thence these Rivers fall down with such a headlong violence, as words cannot express; and with that force so impulsed and press, they are carried under the deep Ocean, and do again rise and boil up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephraim, which is this: Ephraim dicit, Paradisum ambire terram, atque ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totam terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet Regione, non alter atque Lunæ orbis Lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradise doth compass or* embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it environeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moon doth embrace the Moon. To the end therefore that these ridiculous Explications and Opinions do not bring question unto Truth it self, or make the same subject to doubts or disputes, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Navel of this our World, and (as McLendon saies) in parte Terræ meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Universal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of Nations, and of the Worlds inhabitation: for near unto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the Flood, into all other remote Regions and Countreys. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their own forefathers have come, and out of what Regions and Nations; it cannot be displeasing to understand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the streams and branches of Mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several Opinions before remembered, by the Truth it self; and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common Reason; and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightful Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused hills in the Earth.

AND first, whereas it is supposed by Augustine, Chrysostomus, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountains, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other strange effects): for mine own opinion, I think neither the one, nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and grown old, in respect of the first beauty (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed); yet if there had been no sign of any such place, or if the soil and seat had not remained, then would would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850 years after the Flood, have described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses, would not have made so often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it self were not thereto be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remain the same Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tygris, and Euphrates, we are sure to find in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these Rivers, which afterward doth divide it self into four branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it self. For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four heads; Now, whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it self, or to Paradise; yet the division, and branching of those Rivers, must be in the North, or South side of the very Garden (if the Rivers run as they do, North and South) and therefore these Rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the Flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered, as future ages knew it not, so is there no probability that either these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new Rivers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deep Valleys. For what descent of waters could there be in a Spherical and round body, wherein there is no high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of wind, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the Ebb or Flood of the Sea. But that there was any wind (whereby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a wind to pass upon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, until the waters sank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodness, caused the wind to blow, to drie up the abundant slime and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanse the Air of thick vapours, and unwholesome mists: and this we know by experience, that all downy rains do evermore disperse the violence of outrageous winds, and beat down, and level the swelling and mountainous billows of the Sea: for any Ebbs and Floods there could be none, when the waters were equal, and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indrafts, Bays, or Gulfs to receive a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the Waters rather stood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Josephus avoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seen in his days; which pillars were set up above 1426 years before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Joseph himself to have lived some forty or fifty years after Christ: of whom, although there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seen. Now, that such pillars were raised by Seth all Antiquity hath avowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom, although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the City of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea, the ruines thereof, Annius (who commended upon that invented fragment) saith, were to be seen in his days, who lived in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this City of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cujus maxime & ingentis molis fundamenta videntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt: The foundation of which huge mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the City of Joppa was built before the Flood, over which Cepha was King: whose name, with his brother Phineas, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found graven upon certain Altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruines of this other City, called Enoch by Annius, might be seen, though founded in the first age: but it could not be of the first City of the World, built by Cain; the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the Flood was not the cause of mountains, but that there were were mountains from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the Flood overflowed by fifteen Cubits the highest Mountains. And Josephus Damascenus, speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Attingadam excelsum Mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confingentes multos, sermo est, Diluvii tempore liberatos. And upon Minyada there is an high Mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which it is said, that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now, although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saved than eight persons (which Mosius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountains were before the Flood, which were afterward, and ever since, known by the same names; and on which Mountains it is generally received, that the Ark rested: but untruly, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was known before the Flood: on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saved themselves also; but, as Annius saith, without all authority, either divine or humane.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turn upside down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that when Noah sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive leaf in her mouth, which he had plucked, and which (until the Trees were discovered) he found not: for otherwise the might have found them floating on the waters; a manifest proof, that the Trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters, for it is written: solum, olive raptum, or decerptum, a leaf plucked, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding Ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of those four Rivers.

His conceit of Aug. Chrysostomus being answered, who only giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Coropius, Becanus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this Universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, Fill the Earth, and subdue it, Rule over every Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, And hath made of one blood all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, do no way prove such a generality: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now, although all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adam's Posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the Earth: yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dress and cultivate, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the Universal, Moses would not then have said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath not East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angel of God been set to keep the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the Universal had been Paradise? for then must Adam have been chased also out of the World. For if all the Earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should believe with Aetodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirm, That in so large a field, as the Universal, there should grow but one Thistle. Noviomagus upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountain, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those four Rivers, being so understood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Psion was falsely taken for Ganges, and Gebon falsely for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Havila in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Coropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius. That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Countrey in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Cathary in Hiersusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Flood, yet Adam's ribs bones must have contained a thousand fathom, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the Middle Region of the Air.

Thirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the School-men affirm, Paradise to be a Place altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was far in the East, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and near the Orbe of the Moon (which opinion, though the School-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius lays it off from Beda, upon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus;) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographic of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or nearest Heaven; It may seem, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for Heaven it self, into which the Souls of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for fear of the Areopagites (in this, and many other divine apprehensions) let down what they believed in plain terms, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one only powerfull God; and therefore did the Devil himself do him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgment of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestial Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightful, and healthfull, upon the top of Mount Atbo (called Acrathoni) which being above all Clouds of Rain, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their so many years) are called Macrobii (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is used, for proof of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preferred from the violence of the Flood: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Souls were preserved till the last Judgment; which Trennus and Justine Martyr also believed. But this opinion was of all Catholic Divines re-proved, and in the Florentine Council damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this judgment: Sicut certum est, Enoch & Eliam, nunc vivere: ita nbi nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live; so where they live, in Paradise, or elsewhere, it is uncertain. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the four Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the Earth, and have risen again in the far distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: (for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inventer.)

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so near the Moon, it had been too near the Sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joyned a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Air in that Region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the space between the Earth and the Moon (according to Ptoleme and Alfagamus) is seventeen times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole Earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, seeing it would deprive us of the the Sun's light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell near those fairs of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like those that dwell near the Catadupes, or over-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-falls, then those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling near them are not deaf at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hec apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in Basil or Ambrose.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias. God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith Saint Paul) but all shall be changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Flood all perished on the earth, saving eight persons; and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be.

For Tostatus his own opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Air, and twenty cubits above all Mountains, that the Flood did not therefore reach it (which Scotus and other latter School-men also believed; for, say they, there were no finners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to over-whelm it;) this is also contrary to the express letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell give credit to Masius Damasceus, and the Thalmutists, who affirm, that there were of the Giants that saved themselves on the Mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus being (as the rest of the School-men are) full of distinction, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea; and at Jordan, and as the Flood was not natural, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifyeth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not believed, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seem to affirm in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty so resembled

But this I dare avow of all those School-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better reach all their Followers to shift, then to resolve, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confess that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, over-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountain-tops, do not find the alhes (remaining of their sacrifices) blown thence, nor thence wash'd off by rains, when they return: yet experience hath resolved us, that these reports are fabulous; and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountains is far under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these self-Hills the air is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of air to mount her self by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Equinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

Those which come neerer unto Reason, find Paradise under the Equinoctial line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus: judging, that there-under might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soil: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the Sun. But this is (non causa pro causa) for although Paradise could not be under the Line, because Eden is far from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tygris, or Ganges under it (Ganges being one of the four rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Country, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Equinoctial, did so much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those Countries which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those days it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which go against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerer to the Line it self. For hereof Experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed, it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconveniences which we contemplate a far off, are found by trial and the witness of mens travails, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitless lump to fallow on the rest. For God himself (saith Esay) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that these hottest Regions of the world, seated under the Aequinoctial line, or neer it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Eastern wind (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heat of the day, as the down-right beams of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconvenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my self have seen, neer the Line and under it) I know no other part of the World of better, or equal temper: Only there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountains are barr'd from this ayr and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soils we find also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions have so many goodly Rivers, Fountains, and little Brooks, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees, casting shade; so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever bearing; and at all times beautified with blossom and fruit both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughs and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Tomatoe any time despite her withered Husband Vermumus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vitiole, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that, to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion, were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse; and (to say the truth) all the School-men were grofs in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Calofyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved, out of Esa. 37. and Ezek. 27.

These opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as modern.

Besides, we find that the Affrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus only and a few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised, once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transferr the names of all those principal Places and Cities in the East: And after them, the Turks hath fought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the ancient memory of those people, which he hath subjected and intrahled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tygris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two Considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and, that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this Region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden; neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as are expres'd to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility, and the rivers only described, we must seek it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour-Nations better described. In the Prophet Iffay, I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabshakeh: Have the gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as Gofan, and Haran, and Refeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaifar; and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Affur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants, &c.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces, whereof the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapollitan: the second part is that Valley called Avenis, otherwise Convalis, or the tract of Chamath, where Affria is joyned to Arabia the Desart; and where Ptoleme placeth the City of Averia: and the third is known by the name of Domus Edenis, or Celo-Syria, otherwise Vallis cava, or the hollow Valley, because the mountains of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Cele in Greek is Cava in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this Province lie East from Canaan, but North, and so joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little City therein called Paradise, the Jews believed this Celo-Syria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hoplins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise, though, to give Beroaldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hoplins, and to all other later Writers, saying, That he failed in distinguishing these two Regions; both called Eden: and that he altogether misunderstood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gebon, as shall appear hereafter. Now to find out Eden; (which as Moses teacheth us) lay Eastward from the Desarts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red-Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Iffay and Ezechiel joyneth with it. For (saith Iffay) Gofan, Haran, and Refeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaifar. Also Ezechiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who together with those of Sheba, Affur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (saith Ezechiel) The Mart of the people for many Ifes. And it hath ever been the custom, that the Persians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tygris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the City of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issus, now Lajazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-town of that part of the World, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities every Country yielded; and having counted the several People and Countreys, he addeth the particular Trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy Merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue Silk, and of broyered works, fine Linnen, Coral, and Pearl: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The Merchants of Sheba and Raamah were thy Merchants, they occupied in the Fairs, with the chief of all Spices, and with all precious Stones, and Gold. Now, these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yield: and because Sheba and Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulf; therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gumms, and Pearls, as their own Countries yielded: and (withall) having trade with their Neighbors of India, had from them also all sorts of Spices, & plenty of Gold. The better to convey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans, or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tygris, and from the City of Teredon, (built or enlarged by Nelmuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent up all these rich Merchandizes by Boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reached within three days journey of Aleppo, and then over Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now, the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited far up the River, and received this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they received out of Persia, which bordered them. Saint Hierome understandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated upon Euphrates, Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Selencus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hierosolymitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon: but Ctesiphon is seated down low upon Tygris, and Canneh cannot be on that side. I mean, on the East-side of Tygris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenite upon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be fordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Desert, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desert of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (where Euphrates reflecteth) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves, from their own City of Canneh in Shinar, Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the City of Thapsacus, where Prolemey appointed the Fords of Euphrates: which altogether with the description of the Schenite by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Selenciam, & Babyloniam emittibus, iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which travel from Syria to Selucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those that take Canneh for Charran, do much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia; not upon Euphrates it self, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) They of Haran and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Assir, and Chilmad, were they Merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometimes called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the Region of Mesopotamia; or Aranthionum, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing, A country between Rivers: for Mesos in Greek, is medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluviu. And when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it self, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid). For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giveth that tract of Land from the borders of Calasyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Batanea, and the North part of the Deserts, stretching themselves toward the inhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lieth between Syria, and Arabia the Desert. So as these of Canneh lay in the very highway from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran, and to Eden:

and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Selucia: for Selucia was antiently called Chalanne (witness Aprian) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of Languages being changed from Chalne, or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Selucia, and almost the next unto it (as) Thelbe-Canne, and Maan-Canne, the one a little to the West of Selucia, and the other opposite unto it; where these Rivers of Tygris and Euphrates are ready to joyn. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canneh was (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain feat thereof, that so many other Cities did retain a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Maan to the word Canneh, were but to make difference between the East and the West, or the greater and the less Canneh, or between Canneh the old and the new: which additions to distinguishing Cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other City joyned with Eden, as Haran, or Charran, S. Hierome on the Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumque reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quæ est in medio itinere contra Ninevem, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the mid-way against Nineveh) the eleventh day.

This City is by the Martyr Stephen, named Charran (speaking to the High-Priest:) Te Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared to our Father Abraham, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the feat of this City is not doubted of: for it is not only remembered in many Scriptures, but withall exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Crausus the Romaine, who for his unfatiable greediness, was called Gargæ avaritie; the Gulf of avarice. Whereof Lucan: Affrica Latio maculavit sanguine Carras. With Roman blood th' Assyrian Carre he defil'd.

But this City Canneh, or Chalne, is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written of Nimrod: And the beginning of his Kingdoms was Babel, & Erech, and Acad, and Chalne, in the Land of Sinar, or Shinar; where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subject unto Nimrod; all which lay in the the said Valley of Shinar, or near it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it self, Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinar, idem sunt (saith Comestor). Three names of one Country: which Region of Babylonia, took name of the Tower Babel; and the Tower of the confusion of Tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plain Babylon was built (as aforesaid).

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians; and Isaiah in the threats of Senacherib against Jerusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telaassar. But before I conclude where Eden it self lieth, it is necessary to describe those other Countreys, which Ezechiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembred, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: *Moreover the Sons of Ham were Cush, &c. And the Sons of Cush were Seba, and Havila and Sabtah, and Raamah, &c. And the Sons of Raamah were Seba, &c. and anon after; Cush begat Nimrod: so as Seba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the Son of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma took that part adjoining to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterwards Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith Ezechiel) the Merchants of Raamah and Sheba were they Merchants, they occupied in thy fair with the chief of all spices, and all precious stones, and Gold. So as Seba was that Tract of Countrey, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which joyneth to the Sea where Tygris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrey, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and* Frankincense is gathered: which people have an interchange or Trade with Elana, lying on the East-side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to have been the Merchants of Tyre, for Gold, Spices, and precious Stones: of which they had not only plenty of their own, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatics, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reporteth out of Eratosthenes, In Persice ora initio Insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi unguines gignantur: in aliis vero, clari & perlicudi lapilli. Eratosthenes (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that, In the beginning of the Persian gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious Pearls bred: and in other, very clear and shining Stones. Now, the difference between Seba the Son of Raamah, and Seba the Son of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samoch;) and Seba with (Schin;) but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countreys and Habitations are diverse. For Seba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea, and Saba (whence the Queen of Saba) neighboured the Red-Sea; and so that place of the 72 Psalm expounded Reger Arabum & Sabæ, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Seba & Sabæ.

The Shebeans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited upon the Out-let of the same River, upon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Seba, towards the Sea-coast, and upon it, past up the Countrey, by Tygris and Euphrates, being joyned in one main stream, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tygris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and North-west: so doth Seba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphrasts; which Countrey, by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews also often use.

Thus much of those Countreys which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telaassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telaassar lay most convenient, both to receive the Trade from Seba and Arabia, and also to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyrrus. Now, to make these things the more plain, we must remember, that that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were utterly dis-joynd.

For it appeareth both in Ezay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabshake, the while the Army of Affria lay before Jerusalem, that the Cities of Gofan, Haran, Refeph, and the Edenites at Telasar, had resisted the Affrians: though by them (in a fort) massacred and recovered. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed as Gofan, and Harar, Refeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telasar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subjection: for Efar-Haddon held Affria; and Aterodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabshake which lay before Jerusalem (Hezekias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God destroyed; the King of Babel sent to Hezekias, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Affrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himself was slain by his own sons in the Temple of his Idols, Efar-Haddon succeeding him in Affria. To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Aterodach, Hezekias shewed all his treasures as well proper as consecrate, which invited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conquest and subversion. So as, the suspicion of war encreasing between Babylon and Affria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Affria, were employed to bear off the incursions of the Affrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telasar: and the very word (Telasar) saith Junius, signifying as much as a Bulwark against the Affrians. This place Hieroglyphicus takes for Refem, others for Seleucia: but this Telasar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the History of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprise of Persia) calleth Thibatha in stead of Telasar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Book: It is seated in an Island of Euphrates upon a steep and unassailable Rock, in so much as the Emperor Julian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garrison against the Affrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Country adjoining were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolemy calleth Teridata, having Refeph (which he calleth Refeph) on the left hand; and Canneb, (which he calleth Thelbe-Canne) on the right hand; not far from whence, is also found the City of Mann-Canne, upon Tygris; and all these seated together, as Ezay and Ezechiel have sorted them. But the understanding of these places is the more difficult, because Affria (which the Chaldeans call Atturia), and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded; the one taken for the other by interchanging of Dominion. Affria & Mesopotamia in Babylonia nomen transferunt (saith Niger.) Affria and Mesopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, as, by Charan or Harar in Mesopotamia: also by Canneb and Refeph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaverat autem J EHOVAH Deus bethum in Eden, ab Oriente: The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden Eastward: that is (saith he in his Annotations) Jusserat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabie & Mesopotamiae; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

And for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seems by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia: which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andrew Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seems we may have some farther light for the proof of that, which we have said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both, there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tygris, or at least, Tygris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, The Island, by an eminency.) It hath (saith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtless) remain to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed up with the fame of those flourishing Kingdoms of Mesopotamia, Affria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath upon the River, and not far beyond it, the City of Hafan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, hath Mofal or Mofel, from which (as in that which which followeth it shall appear out of Masius) it is not above twelve miles distant. Neither is it to trouble us, That Mofal or Mofel, by Marius Niger is remembered among the Cities higher up Tygris, in these words, Juxta autem Tygris, Civitates sunt Dorbela prope Taurum montem, quae nunc Mofel dicitur: magna sane, &c. (that is) By Tygris are these Cities; Dorbela near unto mount Taurus (which is now Mofal) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mofel, and making it to be Dorbela (I say) needs not here to trouble us: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwell there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Mofal (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Mesopotamia and Affria, seated upon Tygris, and in the neighbour-hood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Civitatem Mofel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Nineve; Of all the Cities and Towns which are about the City of Mofal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Nineve. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon a City thereabout to be called Affur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not far off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Affur. By this then we may come somewhat near the end of our purpose. For the Isle of Eden, which lieth in the brest of Tygris, is but twelve miles from Mofal, and that ancient City, which Ptolemy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve; Philobratius, and Simeon Sethi, Mofala, and John Leas, Mofal, others Mosse, (though it be not the same with Mofal) is set but a little higher upon the same River of Tygris, near Mofal: so that we are like to find this Isle of Eden hereabout. For the same Andrew Masius, which placeth it above Mofal, makes it to be below Hafan-Cepha, which is upon the same River of Tygris.

The only difficulty is this, that some perhaps may think, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speak not of any isle in Tygris, called the Isle of Eden, but of an Isle in Tygris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more improbable. And yet, if this were the meaning here, we have a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not only Euphrates, but also Tygris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been subject to the same change; that all other Kingdoms of the world have been, and hath by conquest and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after the Flood called Shinar; and then, of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Affria, and Armenia, which imbraceth both the banks of Tygris between Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Ethicus maketh mention, (not that latter Ethicus, Disciple of Gallinus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenaeus called Isiri, who lived in Egypt in the Reign of Philaadelphus; but another of a far higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of the Greek by Saint Hierom. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written, in Ethicus, Adonis for Edenis: yet Adonis being a River of Phenicia, cannot be understood to bethe Region named by Ethicus. For Ethicus makes it a Country, and not a River, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Ethiopia, calling the land of Chus Ethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions (saith Ethicus) falleth into the Gulf of Persia: which River he called Armodius for Tygris; Tygris being but a name imposed for the swiftness thereof. And out of Armenia, both Tygris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all known by the name of Eden, for their beauty and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaves are always green, and therefore therein a perpetual Spring. Also Stephanus de Urbibus, mentioneth the City of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in use in Amos's time, though he spake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Celo-Syria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tygris (once joyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those four heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were divided: whose courses being known, Eden (out of which they are said to come) cannot be unknown. Now that Hiddekel and Perath, were Tygris and Euphrates, tes, it is agreed by all: for the Seventy and all others convert Perath by Emphrates: & Hiddekel, Tygris omnes exponunt; & And almen under And Hiddekel by Tygris (saith Vatablus.) And because that which I have said of the Ille of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of self-invention, I have here-under sent down the words out of the two general Epistles of the Nestorians, as Mafius (at verbum) hath converted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, That the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Affria, Persia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Mary's time they had) fifteen Churches in one City called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel upon the River of Tygris; having no sufficient authority to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three Metropolitan Bishops at the least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtain allowance unto such an Election, as themselves had made: having three hundred year before that, upon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made known to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for, upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himself, had forborn to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-government. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred years had been of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stock and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignity which his Predecessors had held; the rest of the professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the general Epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the said Epistle; Verum nos non acceptavimus, neq; proclamavimus ipsum; sed sibi libito convenimus ex omnibus levis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Croitibus & Pagis que sunt circum civitatem Mosel (hoc est, Attur) in vicinijs ad Niveces, & ex Babylonia, ex Charrâ, ex Arbella, ex Insula que est in medio Tygris, summi: Eden, &c. i. e. But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring upon Niveces; and out of Babylon, Carra, Arbella; and out of the Island which lyeth in the middle of Tygris, a River of Eden, or rather out of the Isle of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tygris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they used these words: *Neq; superant apud nos Metropolita, quorum est ordinare Catholicum: sed soli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbelle, Episcopus almasi, Episcopus Adurbegansen è vestigio convenimus in Insulam, que est intra Tygris flumen, Eden; secimusq; conspectum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordain a Patriarch, but only a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmasus, and the Bishop of Adurbegansen: but lo, we assembled speedily in the Island of Eden, which is in Tygris, and agreed between our selves, &c.*

Now this Island of Eden, Mafius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the four sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which he calleth Nestorians, Jacobites, Maronites, and Coptis, he goeth on in these words: *Mox, audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumulari in illam quam modo dixi Tygris Insulam, que duodecim circiter passuum milibus supra Mosel posita, decem fere milia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq; cincta, & a paucis alijs quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Island of Tygris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelve miles above Mosel, containing very near ten miles in compass, and every where incircled with a wall, inhabited by few other men then Christians. And afterward, he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Ille of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tygris; five Geserta. Furthermore, describ- ing the City of Hofan-Cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictam Tygris Insulam, rapti aspera impostam: Above the afore-said Island of Tygris, being seated on a steep Rock. Of this Island of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Book of his general Cosmography, in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la Riviere du Tygre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie; Geserta ou Gesire is in the middle of Tygris, the soyle the most fertile of all Asia.*

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liveth; and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petrea, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Carra according to Ezechiel, and that that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and joyned with those Nations of Reseph, Carneh, and Charra, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parling of the two Regions of Affria, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrioned to resist the Affrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written); and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Emphrates, two of the known Rivers of those four, which are by all men agreed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one stream.

BUT it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plural: which scruple Matthæus Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith he, hath these words: *Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Que verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur: Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene (hoc est) fluvius procedebat ex Edene regione ad irrigandum pomarium: & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into four heads: Which words (saith Beroaldus) do better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads. The Tygrine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus, Et fluvius egrediebatur de delicijs; And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightful and fertile, and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Country of Eden, and not to the Garden it self.*

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usual among the Hebrews: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herb that feedeth Seed, the fruitful Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plural, Herb and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and again, We eat of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees.) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is David Kimchi, and Vatablus, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrews do often put the Singular for the Plural, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum; and he giveth an instance in this question it self, as, A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, be given to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the four heads, to be four notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (River) Verse the tenth for one River, (to wit) Emphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have been) divides it self, and ere long yieldeth four notable passages into several Countries, though not all the way down stream (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River downward, there is conveyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Affria) were up Tygris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it is riseth from the River of Eden, doth not say, it compasseth or walleth the whole Region of Affria (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth towards Affria. The first branch Pison, is Nabar-malcha (by interpretation) Baslinus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tygris under Apamia; whence riseth the name of Pas-Tygris, as it were Piso-Tygris. This leadeth to the Land of Havila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabarsares or Narragas; for Nabar-gas is both which names signify flumen derivatum (a River derived,) also Aracanus, quasi Ran-nosus, by reason of the Froggie Fens which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper stream of Pison, or Baslinus, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly to be called (that is, into Tygris) above Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tygris into Affria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tygris, having before no known proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otriv. But be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tygris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not far from these Rivers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plain it is that Hiddekel is Tygris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastward towards Assur, as we find, that Tygris is the River of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chief City was Nineveh, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Nineveh, which was the chief City of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of four heads, though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first stream. Caput aquæ (saith Plinius) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; si ex fonte nascatur, fons; si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountain, then is the Fountain taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a main River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it self with new banks, there is that part of the River, where the branch forsaketh the main stream, called the head of the River.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian Soyl, as it is certain that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which, if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the Curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same virtue to any Plant thereon growing, that they had before the Flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I find written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnes, and speaketh of the very place it self; for the Isle of Eden is but twelve miles, or thereabout, from Nineveh, and so from Mosul. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tygrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod Urbs Nini sita erat. Hæc Regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tygris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent: and he addeth afterward; Cerevis autem finitum procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold: The leaves of Wheat and Barley, being almost four fingers broad. As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are even in length like unto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speak thereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulnes, will seem very incredible to those, which never were in the Countrey of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Countrey Palm-Trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meats and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig-Trees. Thus far Herodotus.

To this Palm-Tree, so much admired in the East-India, Strabo and Niger add a fourth excellency, which is, that it yieldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vinegar. But Antonius the Eremita findeth a fifth commodity, not inferior to any of those four, which is, that from this self-same Tree, there is drawn a kind of fine Flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their Ships. And that this is true, Albanus in the life of Antonius the Eremita, confesseth, saying: That he received a garment made thereof from the Eremita himself, which he brought with him out this Region. So therefore those Trees which the East Indies so highly esteem and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yielded no plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) pallim per omnem Regionem palme sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palms over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place, Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Emittit à parte levia Arabia (odorum fertilitate nobilis) regio campestris interfluit inter Tygrim & Euphratem jacens, tam ubere & pingui solo, ut à pastu repellit pecora dicantur, ne fœtibus perimat; (that is) As you travel on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet Odours) there lieth a Champain Countrey placed between Tygris and Euphrates, of so fruitful and fat a soil, that they are said to drive their their Cattel from pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. Bis in anno segetes Babylonii fecant; The Babylonians cut their Corn twice a year (saith Niger.) And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, than in the Northern parts: so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South parts of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and Trees always green: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies onely, by reason of the Sun's neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of Nature in a perpetual activity. In brief, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow down their Corn-fields, and a third time to eat them up with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty years, could not make our kind of Wheat bear seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitless. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that soil, That the second year, the very stubble (or rather falling down of the seeds again) yieldeth them a harvest of Corn without any further labour: his words are these, Obertatis tanta sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restitibilis fiat seges.

§. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

AFTER the discovery of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertility thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tygris and Euphrates: For, that the knowledge and certainty of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me; seeing necessity it self (Tygris and Euphrates being known) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tygris, or both, be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise; which River or Rivers, Moses witnesseth afterward divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancy in the world, than when we find both these (namely) Tygris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seek the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Rivers as far distant as any of fame known or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into four branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason, and Experience bearing witness. There is no error which hath not some slipperiness and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who study to be singular) find out (fraining Reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention and jangling; not doubting, but in the variable deformity of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their help to nurse and cherish such weak Babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Pison) seemeth to have grown out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah which adjoyneth to Babylonia, afterward known by the name of Susiana. For Havilah upon Tygris, took name from Havilah the Son of Cneph, and Havilah in India, from Havilah the Son of Jochan; the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth down the generations of Noah, and his Sons after the Flood. For the Sons of Cneph were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, and Ramath, and the Sons of Jochan were Ophir, and Havilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the Sons of Jochan, that Island of Ophir, (whence Solomon had Gold) and Havilah adjoyning, had their names. Now, because Ganges is a great and a famous River of the East India, and Havilah a Countrey of the fame, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which River is said by Moses, to water the Land of Havilah. Or perhaps, it was supposed, that those four Rivers named by Moses, must of necessity be four of the greatest in the World; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous River after Tygris and Euphrates.) they chose out this River to make one of the four. And yet certainly there is another River, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges: for the River Indus on this side India, for beauty, for nameless, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be of the four heads, seeing Indus cometh between it and Tygris? and between Tygris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdoms. And again, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between those two proud Rivers

Gen. 10. 19.

Gen. 2. 11.

Rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the four, because it is removed from Tygris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much less Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little less than forty degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whosoever readeth the Story of Alexander, shall find that there is no River in Asia, that can exceed Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himself, and the greatest part of his Army, and in sailing down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deep, and by reason thereof to great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having besides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Suastus, Acseiner, Adris (otherwise Hiratis), Hispalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed up with all their children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one stream, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaita visiteth the Ocean Sea.

But because Pison, which compasseth Havilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must somewhere be joynted with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceed out of the same Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads do proceed; out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other be Ganges, or Nilus: For Nilus riseth in the uttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterranean Sea; and the River Ganges riseth out of the Mountain Imanus, or (as others will have it) Caucasus, which divides the Northern Synthia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tygris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, near Georgiana or Iberia, the other is not far off in the same Armenia, by the Georgian Mountains; so as Ganges, who only travellith in her own India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, never law the land of Eden, or joynted themselves in one channel, either with themselves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moses.

Therefore the River Pison, which enricheth Havilah, is the same which by joyning it self with Tygris, was therefore called Pis-Tygris or Tygr-Tygris, of Pison and Tygris, which River watereth that Havilah, which Havilah the son of Cush gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, so called of Havilah the Son of Joſan, who inhabited with his brother Opſir in the East. And this Havilah of the Cushites had also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a Tree of the bigness of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yieldeth a certain Gum sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrews take the Loadstone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew signifieth Pearl: so doth Eugubinus; and Herom calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearl, Havilah or Susiana hath plenty of both. Now this Country of Susiana or Havilah, stretcheth it self towards the North as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Trade of Land Southward, as far as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the City of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of Gold; which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

The Greeks had a conceit, that Pison was Stench. Danubius: the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Hopk. de Par. Aben-Ezra (saith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadai, translatheth Pison into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Helleſpont, and all Asia the less between it and Tygris. Now Pison, which runneth through Havilah or Susiana, doth to this day retain some signe of this name; for where it and Tygris embraceth each other under the City of Apamia, there do they agree of a joynt and compounded name, and are called Piso-Tygris. And it is strange unto me, that from so great antiquity there should be found remaining any resembling sound of the first name: for Babylon it self, which dwelleth so near these Rivers, is by some writers known by the name of Bandas, as, by Postellus: by Cassiodorus, of Baldub: by Baris, of Bagdad; and of Bongedor, by Andrew Thevet; and yet all those that have lately seen it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Ptolemy indeed with many others give the name of Babylus or Regius, and Gehon they term Mahareser, and Marsias, and Barsares. So is Euphrates, near the Spring and Fountain, by Strabo and Pliny called Pixrates: by Junius, Puck-perab, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profusion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Phitarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrews Parath (saith Ar. Montanus;) Pagninus, Perath: Josephus, Pkorab; Ensebinus, Zeozimus; Ammianus, Ammianus, Chalymicus: Gistiliannus and Collutius, term it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nabor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The same confusion of names hath Tygris, as Diglio and Diglat, Seilax and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants, Tegil.

But Mercer upon Genesis conceiveth rightly of these Rivers: for Euphrates and Tygris (saith he) stream into four branches; two of which keep their ancient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason why these two Rivers, joynted in one (below Apamia;) lose their names and are called Piso-Tygris, and the memory of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channel of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldea, not far from Ur, the City of Abraham, and fall not entirely into the Persian Sea, as Tygris, accompanied with Pison, doth.

This error, that Pison was Ganges, was first broached by Josephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authority to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For, Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierom, take this for current; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India to find out Havilah: so was Gehon drawn into Africa to compass Ethiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsely interpreted Ethiopia) fastned to it on the other side, we shall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impose upon men the transportation of Rivers, from one end of the World to the other, which (among other uses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cush the Son of Ham first late down with his Sons Shebab, Havilah, Sabab, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the Son of Cush did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the Land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, took name of Cush himself. For as the Sons of Joſan, Opſir, and Havilah, seated themselves as near together as they could in India, so did the Sons of Cush in Shinar, or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah, or Chavilah, was first Chusea, of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Havilah unto the Desarts of Sur,

did the Israelites and Amalekites possess all the interjacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphrast converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the Red-Sea. But this was not meant from Sur upon the Red-Sea, to Havilah in the East India, for Saul was no such Traveller or Conqueror, and therefore Havilah must be found nearer home, where the Sons of Amiel inhabited, and which Country Saul wasted: for Amalek and the Amalekites possessed that neck of Country, between the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Havilah being the extremity of the one, towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leaving that great body of Arabia felix towards the South, and they spread themselves with the Midianites and Edumaeans, from the East-part, or backside of the Holy Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petraea, and Deserta.

§. XIV.

Of the River Gehon, and the Land of Cush, and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush, 2 Chron. 21. 16.

Now as Havilah in the East India drew Pison so far out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventy translated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Greeks, whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Ethiopian are, as much as black or burnt faces, whose proper Country called Thebaid, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there be many other Regions of Ethiopian, and far South in Africa; yet those of Thebaid are those so often remembered in the Egyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopian are very near, or else directly under the Equinoctial line, which is very far from that Land inhabited by the Chusites, who are neither black of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. This translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two Ethiopia's, the East, and West: and this division he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chus and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petraea, and part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Ethiopia.

Now, if it be granted, that Chus and the Land

Land of the Chusites be that Tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitavit Ismael ab Havilah usque Sur, quæ respicit Egyptum introitusque Assyrios, Ismael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria. The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River that watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitavit Ismael, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the Country bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lieth toward Egypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelve Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions between the border of Egypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) to increase and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zearah the Chusite, which others call Tharantah, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Juda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Egypt; for that had been a strange progress for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, having so mighty a King as the King of Egypt, between Palestina and Æthiopia. But there were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this strength of an Armie, he in following his Victory took some of the Cities of Kearab round about, as Gerar. Now, that Gerar is a City of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the words of the Scripture disproving it: And Abraham departed thence, toward the South Country, and dwelt between Kadeh and Sojournd in Gerar: Now Sur is that part upon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feet after they passed the Red-Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had been weary, and unable to resist. Again, in the Story of Isaac it is written: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech, and the Philistines unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistines were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himself, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gaza towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pererius doth, with an honest excuse, save this Translation of Chus for Æthiopia; yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Josephus did altogether mis-understand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere: For Pliny in his fifth

Book, and eighth Chapter, citeth Homers for an Author of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abissines under Prester John: And the West Æthiopia is that which joyneth it self with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians called Perorij, Davarites, with divers other names, which Pliny numbereth. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, faith Pliny out of Homers, Agrippa and Juba; which Regions indeed I mean that of Niger, and that of Prester John, and the Tragolodites lie due East and West. But as for Cush, and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Josephus was exceeding gross here, in, it appeareth by that fiction which he hath of Moses when he served Pharaoh, in the Wars against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) he transporteth Madian by miracle over the Red-Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the World's Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the Prophet Jeremie; And what hast thou now to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? To this faith Pererius, professing Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, quæ significat Nigrum & turbidum: Truly (saith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor; which significeth black, and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerable argument; that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Jethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greek and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopian; as (with Josephus) the Geneva converts it, though it help it a little with a marginal Note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Country of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red-Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that Moses fled from Pharaoh into the Land of Midian, and sate down by a Well, &c. And again, in the third of Exodus; When Moses kept the sheep of Jethro, his father-in-law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed, these four Nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all, in one general word, Arabians; and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of these names, and sometimes by another; as in Gen. 37. v. 25, 27, and 28. that Joseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Joseph to Potiphar, Pharaoh's Steward. The Genevians, in a marginal Note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who took the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth; and these were all Arabians: and fo in this very place it appeareth by their Merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Joseph: for their Camels were laden with Spicery, and Balm, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is served with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their Spices they received from the East side of the Arabian Gulf, as aforesaid. And in the 39 Chapter, it is said: That Potiphar bought Joseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now to make this the more manifest, it is written, Judg. 6. That when Israel had sown, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and th-y of the East, and came upon them: they of the East were Arabians of the Desert; fo as where before in the buying of Joseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites onely are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites, nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired that every man would give him the golden Ear-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zeba and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 17000 shekels of Gold, it is written: For they had golden Ear-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of War. Manus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God, of Ismael) shall be against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites come the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers think Mahomet to be of the Schenite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Josephus) use poyson upon their Arrows, as the Indians

do. Toward the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites, and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill Translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is, among other places, made most apparent in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jechoram the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; fo Hierome reads it: the Geneva Translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now, how far it is off between the Philistines and the Negro's or the Æthiopians, every man that looketh in a Map may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians do mixe and joyn with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirty, or three and thirty degrees; and therefore not their next neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desert of Sur and Pharan are between them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have been translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jechoram, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Æthiopia in sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; & there remaineth no doubt (saith Steucrius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Country which joyneth to Arabia.

Now, may we think, is it probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would never have named Gehon for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was cast upon Reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharaoh) a River of Egypt, wherein he was born and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but never by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had been a River of Paradise, they might justly have thought, that he had decided them: for they had lived there all days of their lives, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof, except we shall believe the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Pliny) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Olives in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Isaiah, and once in the Prophet Jeremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Æthiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had never any communion or affairs with the Ethiopians, nor any intelligence or trade beyond Egypt, to the South; but the enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often governed by many little kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers or Heads of those Nations; but in one general name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cælo-Syrians, with the Magogians, Tubalites, and others their adherents. And thirdly, within themselves, the Nations which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Sea-coast, as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others; yea, Jerusalem it self was with-held from Israel, from the days of Moses, even unto the time of David, by the Jebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficulty, is, that it doth not appear that any part of Gebon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was, that Matt. Beroaldus lost himself in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gebon and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah; for I find none such In rerum Natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proved that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gebon Nilus; so where to find them elsewhere, it seemeth he knew not. Certainly, this River of Gebon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth far East in Arabia, is but imaginary; for the Current by Gaza, is but a small stream, rising between it and the Red-Sea, whose head from Gaza it self is little more than twenty English miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their near neighbours, and never looked back to the first seats and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his children never rested, till they found the Valley of shinar, in which, and near which himself, with his Sons, first inhabited. Havilah took the River-side of Tygris chiefly on the East, which after his own name he called Havilah, (now Susiana): Raamah, and Sebea farther down the River, in the entrance of Arabia-felix. Nimrod seated himself in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mixraim first kept upon Gebon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldea; and in process of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more Westwardly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mixraim past over into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many years after. Now, because there could be no such River found in Arabia the stony, which they might entitle Gebon, they translated Chus, Ethiopia; and Gebon, Nilus. And if we do examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Island, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and called the Island after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia: and when afterwards, in process of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also entituled by the same name of Britannia, afterwards might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phenicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of the River in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered; Shall we in like sort resolve that France, Spain, and Italy, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gebon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chusites should, or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit; seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have been Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the World. For, though the Babylonian Empire which took beginning in Nimrod the Son of Chus, consisted at the first but of four Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalme; yet we find, that his Successors within a few years after, commanded all the whole World in effect: and the same of Babel consumed the memory of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatness of that Empire founded by Nimrod a younger Son, obliured the name and Nation of his Father Cush in those parts, until they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther ther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soil and Territory, by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not think, that Chus, or any of his, could in half creep through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. years after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Bush and Bryar, Reed and Tree, to joyn themselves (as it were) into one main body and Forrest. For if we look with judgment and reason into the Worlds Plantation, we shall find, that every Family seated themselves as near together as possibly they could; and though necessity enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creep out of Shinar, or Babylonia; yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times resort and succour one another by River, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassible. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength usurped dominion over the rest, sat down in the very confluence of all those Rivers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was, to which the greatest troupes of Noah's children repaired; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increase. The first Father of men, Adam, had therein his former habitation: The second Father of Mankind, Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the youngest, yet strongest, made his choyce of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tygris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Havilah place himself upon Piso-Tygris; Ramab and his Son Sheba farther down upon the same River, on the Sea coast of Arabia: Chush himself upon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwaies fastened themselves to the Rivers sides: for Ninive, Charan, Reseph, Caneb, Ur in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities, were all founded upon these navigable Rivers, or their branches; by which the one might give succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembered.

§. XV.

A conclusion, by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

BUT now to conclude this Dispute; It appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scripture, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram suvorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other (to wit) 35. degrees from the Aequinoctial, and 55. from the North-pole: in which Climate, the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Grain of all sorts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this said soil and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palm-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein soever the Earth, Nature, and the Sun can most vaunt that they have excelled; yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their works: This Tree alone giveth unto man whatsoever his life beggett at Nature's hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer; yet, lay down by those pleasures and benefits, the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Worms, with other inconveniences; and then there will be found no comparison between one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for man's ingratitude and cruelty) cursed the Earth, we cannot judg; but I may safely think, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the Universal World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees, of Life, and of Knowledge; Plants only proper and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so grant a Lord.

The sum of all this is; That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture have been dim-lighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our known World: some, above the middle region of the ayr: some, elevated near the Moon: others, as far South as the Line, or as far North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the ayr, and in mens fancies vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses); Eastward, in respect of Judea, that God planted this Garden; which Eden we find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A River went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it self into four branches; and we find that both Tygris and Euphrates swimming through Eden do joyne in one, and afterward taking waies apart, do water Chus and Havilah, according to Moses, the true seats of Chus and his Sons being then in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joynd, cannot be divided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Rivers of Eden; That Gebon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibility; and this River is a greater stranger to Tygris and Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are between Tygris and Ganges above four thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountains of the Moon, almost as far off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterrane Sea: and Euphrates disfileth out of the Mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulf of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and travaileth North; the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, therefore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leaf following, I have added a Chorographical description of this terrestrial Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I look for, that my labour may but receive an allowance suspended, until such time as this description of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the Tree of Life was a material Tree; and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden Fruit, is made subject to death.

FOR eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge, was Adam driven out of Paradise. In exilium vite temporalis, Into the banishment of temporal life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospel) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile as nothing can fix them, and so slippery as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delivered to the World, an imaginary doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrews) hath a Plural construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of lives, because the fruit thereof had a property, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, and rational life of man; and not only (but for Adam's transgression) had prolonged his own dates, but also given a durable continuance to all his posterity; and that so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

Sam. Sep.
2. l. 1. 174

And although it is hard to think, that flesh and blood could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot, by the unchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures; Man (notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, beautiful, and ungrrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of most Divines) he should have been translated, as Enoch was. And, as before the Flood, the days of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and soon after the Flood, of two hundred years and upwards, even to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandment, the lives of men on earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men have conceived. Chrysostom, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posterity had been immortal. But such is the infinite Wisdom of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not have contained Mankind; or else, that millions of Souls must have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the first number wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: And therefore that by Chrysostom must be understood of immortality of bodies, which should have been translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not material, but a meer Allegorie; taking their strength out of Solomon, where Wisdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life; as out of the Apocalypse, I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the Tree of life which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustine's answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that as there was a terrestrial Paradise, so that was a celestial. For although Agar and Sarah were Figures of the Old and New Testament; yet to think that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were meer foolishness. And so in this place, the sense of the Scripture is manifest; For God brought out of the Earth every Tree fair to the sight, and sweet to the taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the Trees, which the Earth by God's commandment produced, the Tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiod, Homer, Ovid, and others, steal the invention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they took the Platform of the Orchard of Alecinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Neêar and Ambrosia; for Neêar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young; and Ambrosia, immortality; and therefore said to be the meat and drink of the gods.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOW, for the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, some men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himself the honor to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever guess at, whereas Goropius much marvelled. But as he had an inventive brain, so there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himself. Surely, howsoever his opinion may be valued, yet he usurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the invention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses, Bar-Cephas fastened on this conjecture above six hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephas himself referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus

Maburgenfis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that belief. For Moses, Bar-Cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, The Indian Fig-Tree; of which the greatest plenty (saith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Acefnis, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallics, in or near the Kingdom of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bigness of a great Peaze, or (as Pliny reporteth) somewhat bigger; and that it is a Tree, se femper serens, Always planting it self; that it spreadeth it self so far abroad, as that a troop of Horse-men may hide themselves under it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no less than a shield. Aristobolus affirmeth, that fifty Horse-men may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. Onciferus raiseth this number to four hundred. This Tree (saith Theophrastus) exceeded all other in bigness, which also Pliny and Onciferus confirm: to the trunk of which, these Authors give such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may be, they all speak by an ill-understood report. For this Indian Fig-Tree is not so rare a Plant as Becanus conceiveth, who, because he found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the River Acefnis. But many parts of the world have them, and I my self have seen twenty thousand of them in one Valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot up some twenty or thirty foot in length (some more, some less, according to the soil) they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or stem: for from the utmost end of the head-branches, there issueth out a Gummy juce which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few months reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth, the it taketh root, and then being filled both from the top-boughs, and from his own proper root, this cord maketh it self a Tree exceeding hastily. From the utmost boughs of these young Trees, there fall again the like cords, which in one year and less (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become also Trees of the bigness of the neather part of a Lance, and as streight as Art or Nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Grove, as no other Tree in the world can do. Now, one of these Trees considered, with all his young ones, may may (indeed) shroud four hundred or four thousand Horf-men, if they please; for they cover whole Valleys of ground where these Trees grow near the Sea-bank, as they do by thousands in the inner parts of Trinidado. The cords which fall down over the banks into the Sea, shooting always downward to find root under water, are, in those Seas of the Indies where Oysters breed, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling up one of these cords out of the Sea, I have seen five hundred Oysters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, That Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they bear any such huge leaves, or any such delicate fruit, I could never find, and yet I have travelled a dozen miles together under them. But to return to Goropius Becanus: This Tree (saith he) was good for meat, and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil is described to be.

Secondly, This Tree having so huge a trunk (as the former Authours report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God; for no other Tree (saith he) could contain them. But first it is certain, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or stem: for among ten thousand of them, it is hard to find any one bigger than the rest, and these are all but of a mean size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, In medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters understood in the plural number (that is) In the midst of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-Cephas) word for word, is, That when Adam and Eve found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the Tree it self was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew near it: because Adam being possit with shame, did not run up and down the Garden to seek out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it self; and these leaves of all other were most commodious, by reason of their largeness; which Pliny avoweth in these words, Latitudo foliorum pelis effigiem Amazonia habet; The breadth of the leaves hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrastus confirmeth; the form of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Virg. Æn. Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina pelvis
l. 1. 494: Penthesilea furens.

The *Amazon*s with Crescent-formed shield Penthesilea leads into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be believed, or rather threatneth us all that read him, to give credit to this his borrowed discovery, using this confident (or rather cholerick) speech: *Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hæc à nobis, de sic hanc ex antiquis scriptoribus cum Moisis narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere, Aliam arborem inveniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of Moses, as to dare to avow, That any other Tree can be found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my self, because I neither find this Tree, sorting in body, in largeness of leaves, nor in fruit to this report; I rather incline to the opinion of Philo. That the Earth never brought forth any of these Trees, neither before nor after. But I leave every man to his own belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kind; onely thereby, and by the ease Commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleased God to make trial of his obedience: *Prohibita non propter aliud quam ad commendandum pure ac simplicis obedientia bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, than thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not-unwitty allegorizing of the Story of his Ficus Indica.

BUT in this I must do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it self to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I have gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and upright towards God, until such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandment of his Creatour; and then like unto the boughs of this Tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the Earth, which all the rest of Adam's Posterity after him have done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding umbragiousness of this Tree, he compareth to the dark and shadowed life of man, through which the Sun of justice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climb the Tree of the Cross for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaves, may be compared (saith he) to the little virtue, and unperceived Knowledge among

C. 13. v. 18.*

so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the World most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choler and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest sorrows and repentances. That the leaves are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaves) exceeding little; in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shews, and publick ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seek for the fruit, which ought to be their virtuous and pious actions, we finde it of the bigness of the smallest pease; glory, to all the world apparent; goodness, to all the World invisible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body and boughs of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly ability surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such Men, and such Trees, rather fitting and becoming the unworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, then such a flourishing stateliness, and magnitudo. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and beheld his own nakedness and shame, sought for leaves to cover himself withal: this may serve to put us in mind of his and our sins, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorn our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintain which, we use so many uncharitable and cruel practices in this world.

§. IV.

Of the names of the tree of Knowledge of good and evil: with some other notes touching the story of Adam's sin.

NOW, as touching the sense of this Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the proprietie of the Tree it self, Moses Bar-Cephas, an ancient Syrian-Doctor (translated by Masius) giveth this judgment: That the fruit of this Tree had no such virtue or quality, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Junius also noteth: Arbor scientia boni & mali (id est) experientia boni & mali ab eventu. The Tree of Knowledge of good and evil (that is) the experience of good and evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods own hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed all men living have grown up; and having received immortality from the breath or spirit of God; he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods commandment, was the fearfulllest Evil, and the observation of his perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceive, that sickness is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the insuffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proof thereof in himself another terror than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glass of his own guilty soul, he beheld therein the horror of Gods Judgments; so as he then knew, (he feelingly knew) and had trial of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evil, which could not be expressed. He then saw himself naked both in Body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicity: and therefore was this Tree called the Tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation by any self quality or effect: for the same phrase is used in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signs and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort, as this Tree was called the Tree of Knowledge, because of the event, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contention therefore called Ezekiel, and the Well of hatred Sinath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them: and the heap of Stones called the heap of witness, between Jacob and Laban; not that the Stones bare witness, but for a memory of the Covenant. So Jacob called the house of God Bethel; and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Viventis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affection, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himself, and looking but slightly (as all his issue do) into the miseries and sorrows incident; and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtain by tasting the fruit forbidden: he was transported and blown forward, by the gentle wind of pleasing persuasions, unawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtle arguments of Sathan, who laboured to possion mankind in the very root, which he moistened with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himself perished for ever.

But what means did the Devil find out, or what instruments did his own subtlety present him, as fittest and aptest to work this mischief by? even the unquiet vanity of the Woman; so as by Adams hearkning to the voice of his wife, contrary to the express commandment of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a comfort and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (said God himself) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beasts into whom the Devil entered and perwaded.

Secondly, what was the motive of her disobedience? even a desire to know what was most unfitting for her knowledge; an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posterity of her Sex. Thirdly, what was it that moved the man to yield to her persuasions? even the same cause which hath moved all men since to the like content; namely, an unwillingness to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Solomon the Son of David, Gods chosen servant, and himself a man endowed with the greatest wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the persuasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderful as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages have been allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices by the persuasions of their wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and unquietness.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things, between the Fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.

Of the cause and the revenge of Cains sin: and of his going out from God.

THE same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possessed Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptance of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himself the first Manlayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the revenge of which unnatural murder, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater than he could bear. For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the Sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place, Moses giveth a reason: for saith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himself made the cause known unto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of men only, but in all sorts of Injustice and Oppression. After this Murder of Abel, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literal sense, God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed utrumque simul; God (saith S. Augustine) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by exchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, David witnesseth: If I be in Heaven (saith David) thou art there; if in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Exiit a facie Dei (saith Chrysostom) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord; (that is) he was left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

§. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

His word Nod or Naid, S. Hierom and many others understand to signifie wandering, or uncertain habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Junius; but the Seventy convert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Country, and so doth Josephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else; and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murder committed, justly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: And who ever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me. Now, that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an Abiding; and we call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his first-born, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather fought to fortify himself against revenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Jews; and that as Cain after that he had slain Abel unjustly, had thenceforth no certain abiding in the World: so the Jews, after they had crucified the Son of God, became Runnagates: and it is true, that the Jews had never since any certain Estate, Common-weal, or Prince of their own upon the Earth. Now, this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of the Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soever, which in old time lived by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon white meat, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latines, Pastores vagi, as the Northern Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numbians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and the Northern Tripis: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italy it self, till such time as Nalus (who gave them that name) taught them the husbandry of Tillage, used at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolemy, Calena; which also might be derived of Carena, the Country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Genes. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, &c. and at the East-side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entry into Paradise was from the East; by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region fought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod, or Naid, do signifie profligatus, that is, a Fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, then till he built the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which he enclosed, either for his own defence, or (as Josephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as, for mine own opinion, I am resolved with the septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain useth of himself, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein understood for such an one as travelleth in fear of revenge: For who ever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City of Enoch, were the first society and civil assembly of all other, it is likely that the same of these People (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in memory of Noah and his Sons: so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some virtuously, some impiously disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those People, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it self, where Enoch stood before the Flood, and whereof Monuments might remain (as the pillars or foundation of Joppe did) gave occasion to the Planters of that place, to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Radrira: of the same name many mountains, as those which are otherwise call'd Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath covered over, or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of Plato) exceedingly rejoice, and therewith satiate our selves, if of so great, and almost worn-out Antiquity, of the eldest Peoples names and nations, there remain any print or footstep to Posterity.

In * Pliny, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we find those Henochi, described, though diversely written: as in

H Pliny,

Pliny, sometimes Henochii; in Mela, Enochii; in Flaccus, Heniochi; in Lucan, Eniochi: All which inhabit upon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describe any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometimes he useth the word East or South without borrowing or addition; at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward, or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleventh, he writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar; but in this of Cain, he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two, either to the North, or to the South of the East.

But, as we may conjecture that these Nations took name of Enoch the City of Cain; or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was re-peopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochii of Colchis, and other parts adjoining, were not the first of that name after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World again: because, had this Enoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then been seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth these of Colchis (now, Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolemy, Zaniz; beyond which an hundred & fifty mile Eastward, he findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these he again discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest took beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the mountains of Paropamisus; between them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochii are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it self.

And although we cannot be assured that these Henochii took name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly; yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noah's Sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable than that of Amnis the Friar, who sets Enoch in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden, being directly West.

And besides these several Nations of the Henochii, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with divers mountains about Bactria and Sogdia na, of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word (Heniochi) which signifieth Cart or Coach-men, make these Nations to have sprung from the Waggoners of Caster and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchines, who attended them in the enterprise of Jafon into Colchis. And though I do not deny, but that Jafon, with other Greeks, ranged the coasts of Asia the less, in an open Boat or kind of small Gally, * of whom I shall speak in his own time: yet no man doubteth but that the tale of the golden Fleece was for the most part Poetical; and withall, that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their own Rowers, being fifty four, there was no place, and less use, of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cain's Generation.

But of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Enoch in prophane Story, thus much may suffice: Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certain particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which, for the first, it is demanded, How it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance than his Son Enoch) to perform such a Work as the building of a City, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a mass of all sorts of materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his divine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which lasted, by the least account, 1566 years, in five short Chapters: Yet thus much may every man borrow of his own weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens lives so long a measure as 800. and 900. years, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Enoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World forever: for in what Age of Cain's life he built it, the Scriptures are silent; as of whose times, and the times of his issues, Moses had the least care. And as it is said of Cain, that he built a City: so it was said of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World; but in both, the process of time required, is to be understood: which advice, seeing Moses useth where the space less requirith quireth it, as knowing that he writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, we may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference between the birth of Abel, and the oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos, or a fine diurnum (that is) in process of time, it came to pass that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years foregone, and when his people were increased, he built the City of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Solomon, that he built the Temple of Jerusalem; yet it is well known of Solomon, that he employed in that Work 150000. labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, the King invaded, when he caused an invasion to be made: and he built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing that we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, birth, or death of any of Cain's issues, it is not to be marvelled at, why he also passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his wife, who conceived and bare Enoch, and he built a city, and called the name of the city after the name of his Son Enoch. And to Henoch was born Irad, and Irad begat Methusael, and Methusael begat Methusael, and Methusael Lamech.

Now, of Seth, Moses writeth far otherwise, and in this manner, *And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enoch, and Seth lived after he begat Enoch 807. years, and begat Sons and Daughters: so as all the days of Seth were 912. years, and he dyed: as for the years and times of the wicked, they were not numbered in Libro viventium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established: from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and work Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the reprobate Generation, (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembereth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one; and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth.*

| 4 Cainan . | 9 Lamech , |
| 5 Mahaleel . | and |
| 6 Jared . | 10 Noah . |

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Josephus giveth unto Lamech threecore and seventeen Sons and daughters, by his two Wives, Ada and Sylla: and to these three Sons of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the invention of Pastorage, of Musick, and the working in Metal; for it seemeth that Jubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into Herds and Drovers: Tubal Gen. 4. 20, invented Musick, and Tubal-Cain the working in Brass and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanical, the third given to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepherds, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the issues of Seth began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecy, and Astrology: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second scruple hath been made, How it came to pass that the Patriarchs begat their children at so divers Ages, as Cainan or Cnaan at seventy years, Mahaleel and Enoch at threecore and five years, whereas Jared begat not any of his untill he was 162. years old: Methusael begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. years. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Methusael, or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the Religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctitie, begat children before he was threecore and ten years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first-begotten and eldest Sons of the Patriarchs, but he drew down the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestours, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Jared, nor Lamech the first-born of Methusael.

thysalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sons before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though these three were onely named, and surviving, and which by God were reserved to be the Fathers of mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at threecore and ten years, who was the first Son of Kenan, and then reckon that Methusalem begat Lamech in the 187. year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses rejecteth all the other Sons of Methusalem but Lamech onely, because he was the Father of Noah, as aforesaid. Of this Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth, and one and twentieth Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him; so doth St. Matthew recite the Genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest Sons, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-born, who have hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory onely; and therefore the Evangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ishmael, though Ishmael were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esau the elder; neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from David a younger Son of Jesse; and lastly, we find, that the Kingdom it self of Juda was not given to the Heir in Nature, but to the Heir of Grace, namely Solomon.

§. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs, and some of late memory.

The third Objection is, that the great difference of years between those of the first Age, wherof some of them had well nigh seen a thousand years, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing that soon after the Flood, men lived not a third part of that time; and in succeeding Ages, and to this day, not the tenth.

They that have hereon resolved that those years were but Lunar years (to wit) of a month or thereabouts, or Egyptian years, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the year of his life an hundred and five, if those years be taken but for months, then had Seth lived but eight years and one moneth when he begat Enosh: and if the time of Enosh have the same allowance when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time have been but six years and fourty eight weeks old; and so it may be gathered of the rest, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the trees in their kind, bearing Fruit and Seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at six, seven, or eight years, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and born in the strong youth of the World, had length of daies, and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunar years, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of nine hundred years, had by that account but the time of fourcore and ten and odd years; which were not only less by far then the Patriarchs lived after the Flood, but short of many mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourcore, and some an hundred years. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is writteth, Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good Age, an old man, and of great years: all which (if the former account were of Lunar years) makes but seventeen and an half of our years.

And if we seek for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equal strength or little differing: for of the first and purest seed there must of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfullest plants. Secondly, the Earth it self was then much less corrupt; which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmful quality, as since that time the curse of God, for the cruelty of mans heart, brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the Flood infused such an impurity, as thereby the natural and powerful operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmful change. And as all things under the Sun have one time of strength, and another of weakness, a youth and beauty, and then age and deformity: so Time it self (under the deathful shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worn out that lively virtue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea the Heavens themselves, being of a most pure and cleansed matter, shall wax old as a garment; and and then much more the power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative Virtue from the superior.

But besides the old Age of the World, how far doth our education and simplicity of living differ from that old time? The tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nourished with the Milk of a strange Dugge; an unnatural curiosity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to find out Nurseries, which necessity only ought to commend unto them: The hasty Marriages in tender years, wherein Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her self hath not yet a root sufficient to maintain her own top; and such half-ripe feeds (for the most part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and wax old even in their Infancy. But above all things, the exceeding luxuriousness of this glutinous age, wherein we press Nature with over-weighty burthens, and finding her strength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of strong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verses:

Virg. 4. O Prodigia rerum

Luxuries, nunquam parvo contenta paratis;
Et questum terra pelagoque ciborum
Ambitiosa fames, & laute gloria mensæ, Discite quàm parvo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum nativa petat.

Vita redit: sat est populis, fluvinisque, Cereisque.

Vain-glory of a Table sumptuous,

Virg. 1.

The Egyptians affirm, that the longest time of man's life is an hundred years, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty years, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty years, and Berosus to an hundred and seventeen years. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reprovet, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number, and review of the eighth Region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (saith Pliny) four and fifty persons of an hundred years of age: seven and fifty of an hundred and ten: two of an hundred and five and twenty: four of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred and five and thirty, or an hundred and seven and thirty years old: and last of all, three men of an hundred and forty: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father, and the Son.

The simple diet and temperate life of the Esseans, gave them long account of many years: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persian Magicians, and Indian Brachmans. The Groekes affirm out of Homer, that Nestor lived three Ages, and Tiresias six, Sibylla three hundred years, and Endymion of the Iles Asia, little less: Also Midas of Numidia lived very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Aracadia, many lived three hundred years (saith Epiphorus). Hellanius affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them lived full two hundred years; and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: and that these reports are not fabulous, Josephus bringeth many witnesses with himself; as Atarebon, Berosus, Mochus, Elius, Hieronymus, Egyptius Hecateus, Epiphorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, General of the Turke Army, who had out-lived three hundred years. I my self knew the old Countess of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munster, who lived in the year 1589. and many years since, who was married in Edward the Fourth's time, and held her joynture from all the Earls of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witness: Strozzius Sicogna, out of Torquemada, Maffens, and the like Authours, telleth of some that have not onely far exceeded the term prescribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepit age to fresh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference between the ability of men in those days wherein Galen the Physician lived, it may easily prove unto us, what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let Blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the natural causes of a long and healthfull life: (to wit) strong Parents, Parents, a pure and thin ayre, and temperate use of diet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldering stone, cannot stand long upright; so on Ayre we feed alwaies and in every infant, and on meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge Nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Ayre, and a temperate use of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition : and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

A Fourth scruple hath been made, How the certain knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Universal Flood.

But if we confider the curioſity and policy of elder Ages, we ſhall find, that knowledge was the greateſt treaſure that men fought for, and which they alſo covered and hid from the vulgar ſort, as Jewels of ineffimable price, fearing the irrelevant controuſion of the ignorant and irreligious: ſo as whatſoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in Nature, the ſame was not left to publike diſpute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wiſe men to a poſterity equally Zealous: Ex animo in animum ſine literis, medio intercedente verbo: From mind to mind without Letters, by way of Tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Elders, Origen, and Hilarius (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Mofes did not only upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withal, ſecreteriorem & veram legis enarrationem; a more ſecret and true explanation of the Law; which (ſaith he, out of the ſame Authors,) he delivered by mouth to Joſhua, and Joſhua to the Elders: ſo, to teach theſe myſteries, which he called ſecreteria, to the rare multitude, were no other quàm dare ſanctum canibus, & inter porcos ſpargere Margaritas; then to give holy things to Dogs, and to caſt Pearls before ſwine. In ſucceeding times this underſtanding and wiſdom began to be written in Ciphers and Characters, and Letters bearing the form of Beaſts, Birds, and other creatures; and to be taught only to ſuch as ſerved in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priſts. Of the firſt the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is Receipt in Latine, and a Receiving in English. And this cultume was also held by the Druids; and Bards of our ancient Brittain; and of latter times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rimers. If then such as would fenn wiffet in the use of reason, will not acknowledge, that the story of the Creation or beginning of all things, was written by inspiration; the Holy-Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by Tradition (then used) be delivered unto him by a more certain presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preferred and left to their successors: which their wife men (as they terme them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem lived together with Adam himself two hundred forty and three years, and Noah with Methusalem no less then five hundred years: and before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight years old: from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinary way might come to Ishrac, and so to Moses.

But besides this Tradition, it is questionless, that the use of Letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those Prophecies written on Pillars of Stone and Brick by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time (meaning belike some ruin or foundation thereof) which Pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these Prophecies of Enoch, St. Jude testifieth; and some part of his Books (which contained the counsels of the Stars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix, in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that he had seen, and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and story of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by Tradition and Letter, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange Miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Books of Enoch, howsoever some men make mention of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Pro- piner, John,

pius, GAZENS (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten Traditions, alledged that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphal Scriptures (which he rejecteth) named not these of Enoch's: but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was delivered by Tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Perrinius, that such a Book there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Hereticks, who took occasion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the body of Moses, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their own. One of the greatest arguments against these Books, is, that neither Philo nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will let this opinion of St. Augustine, Scripturæ quidem nonnulla divina Enoc, illum septimum ab Adam, negare non possumus: That Enoch the seventh from Adam, did write divers divine things: we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth, that this Book might be preferred by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the Prophecies remembered by Jude, no man can deny: how they were delivered to posterity, I know not; whether by the Jems Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but mans conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the Stars; and afterwards to some of his Sons, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seen and might preserve this book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seib to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been said before. And therefore if Letters and Arts were known from the time of Seib to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah; it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by Letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the undoubted Word of God need of any other proof then self-authority.

but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Divines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembering (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: saying that Lamech prophesied of his Son Noah, Gen. 5. 19. saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply than of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the war, peace, government, and policy of those strong and mighty men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whose stories, if they had been preserved, and what else was then performed in that newness of the world, there could be nothing of more delight have been left to Posterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their strength of body and natural wits, had the experience added of 800. and 900. years) how much of necessity must the game add of wisdom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of aftertimes, especially in respect of this old age of the world, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus præcepti; (which is) Life is short, art is long, time is headlong. And that those people of the first Age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses: These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renown. But these men of renown (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their own abilities, as they forgot altogether the piety of Seth, and the ways wherein Enoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, only evil and continually evil. And this wickedness was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then universal, when the children and Sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their Idolatrous Wives, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, loving themselves and the world only.

That these Sons of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of women, accompanied them, and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed; namely, Lactantius, and Enselvius, misled by Josephus: of whom I can not doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large answers, and very needles: the question being incapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostom and S. Augustine have answered it largely long ago. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth every where appear in Scripture; and on the contrary, to think that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) beheld the face of God, (that is) always attend his commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madness to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also, divers in later times.

OF these Giants which Moses calleth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his own wit more Gigantical than the bodies of Nimrod, or Hercules) hath written a large Discourse, intituled, Gigantomachia; and strained his brains to prove, that there were never any such men: his reasons (whosever desires to lose time) he may find them in the Treatises before named. It is true, that Cyrillus reproves the Grecian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirm shamelessly, That the Giants have in elder times, not only cast up Mountains upon Mountains, but removed Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of casting up Hills, and making War with the gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the Story of Nimrod, as before remembered; and even out of this Scripture. That the Sons of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit, taken from Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the Sons of the Heaven and the Earth; meaning by the Heavens the Sons of God, and by the Earth, the Daughters of Men: which verses of Orpheus are by John Cassian (who hath written a very witty Discourse of this Subject) thus changed into Latine:

Nomine caelestes illos dixere Gigantes, Orti quid terræ fuerint & sanguine cæli.

From th' Earth, and from thy blood, O Heaven, they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But

But what will not Opinators, and self-believing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there have been in all times since; seeing the Scriptures avow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlative straining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body, and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants; and therefore had ability to oppress, than say, That they were called Giants only, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himself calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards men of renown (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous actions. And if the same stature of body, and ability, had not been found among divers Nations after the general Flood, then might this place of Moses have more willingly hearkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will referre to accompany the Giants of Albion, in the Story of Britain) the Scriptures do clearly, and without all Allegorical construction, avow, That besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, Gen. 14. 5. of Moses, of Josuah, and of David; namely, the Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzai, or Zanzummins in Ham, and the Emims which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab; whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for Giants as the Anakims. Likewise where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon, he useth these words: That also was taken for a Land of Giants, for Giants dwell therein afore-times: and, whom the Ammonites call Zanzummins; a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummins, Chebe-laomer, King of Elam, overthrew, assisted by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites, men of Giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oaks: and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in war. Particularly, it is written, of Og King of Basjan, that his bed of Iron was nine Cubits long, and four Cubits broad: for only Og, King of Basjan, remained of the remnant of the Giants who commanded the Kingdom of Basjan four hundred years after the Expedition of Chebe-laomer. Moreover, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadesh-barne in Paran) made report at their return of the great stature of those people in general, and especially of the Sons of Anak, in these words: *All the people which we saw in it, are men of great stature: for we saw Giants, the sons of Anak, which came of the Giants, so that we feared in our fight, like Grasshoppers, and so we were in their fight (that is) the Searchers found in their own judgments a marvellous difference between the Anakims and themselves: inasmuch that the Israelites were so stricken with fear, as they rather sought, and desired, to return again into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slavery, than to fall by the strokes of those fearful Nations.* Furthermore, the Scriptures put us out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of fix Cubits and a span long: the Armour which he wore, weighed five thousand shekels of Brais: the shaft of his spear was like a Weavers beam, and his spear head weighed six hundred shekels of Iron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath, furnished with twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, even four and twenty.

Also that Samson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had been a Kid, and after slew thirty of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a Jaw-bone of an Ass: And lastly, he took the gates of Anzab, and the two posts, and lifted them away with the bars, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountain before Ebron. If then it be approved by every judgment, that both Nature, and the Heavens wax old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it self) infeebled and almost worn out the virtue of all things, then, I say, That as in all other kinds the Earth (before that Sin had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautiful, than it did in after ages: so also those Giants, those mighty men, and men of renown, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembered by Moses of his own time, and after him their successors, as the ordinary proportion of men in general, soon after the Flood, and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of men which are now born, in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth Age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newness of the World.

But the wickedness (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the Flood, gave end to all flesh, but to the just Noah and his Family. And God repented him that he had made man: which Saint Augustine thus expoundeth: Neque enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui penitet, cujus est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa prescientia. Sed si non uatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris infunabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & periret superbie, & excitet negligentes; & exerceat querentes, & aliat intelligentes; God (saith) he doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as men use to do) but if the Scripture did not use those words, or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it self familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of the truth, and nourish those that understand.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World; and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient Times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old Corruptions, we may find some signs of more ancient Truth.

Here, before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it self for us to consider how the Greeks, and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a myttical fence, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have sought to obscure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those inter-mixed Discourses of God and Nature, for the inventions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stoln out of the Books of God. But, as a skillfull and learned Chymist can as well by separation of visible elements draw helpfull Medicines out of poison, as poison out of the most healthfull Herbs and Plants (all things having in themselves both life and death) so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those that seek after God and Truth, find out every where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively expressed.

§. II.

That the Corruptions themselves were very ancient, as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

But this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning Man-kind, it took such effect, that thereby (the liberal Grace of God being withdrawn) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards born and bred in a world, suffering a perpetual Eclipse of spiritual light. Hence it was that it produced Plants of such imperfection and harmful quality, as the waters of the general flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of man-kind. Yea, even among the few Sons of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poison. For as the children of Shem did inherit the virtues of Seth, Enoch and Noah; so the Sons of Cham did possess the vices of the Sons of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldeans began, soon after the Flood, to ascribe divine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sun, and then the Fire. So the Egyptians and Phœnicians Phœnicians did not onely learn to leave the true God, but created twelve several Gods, and divine powers, whom they worshipped, and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Egyptios in usum habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis episcopi mutatos, eoque prius Aras, & Imagines, & Tempia Diis, sibi crevisse; The Egyptians (saith he) first devised the names of the twelve gods, which the Greeks received from them, who first erected unto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples, for the gods.

§. III.

That in process of time, these lesser errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the gross Superstitions of the Egyptians.

But as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, do then after wander for evermore in vices unknown, and daily travel towards their eternal perdition: so did these gross and blind Idolaters, every Age after other, descend lower and lower, and shrink and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortal men onely, but they gave divine reverence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowls, Winds, Earth, Water, Air, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees, and Roots, to Passions and Affections of the Mind, to Palenes, Sicknes, Sorrows, yea, to the most unworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemey, Rhodius Alexandrides derideth in this manner:

*Bovem colit, ego Deis matro bovem.
Te maximum Anguillam Deum putas: ego Obscuriorum credidi suavissonum.
Carnes fuillas in caves, at gaudes
His maxime: canem colit, quem verbero Edentem ubi deprehendo forte obscurum.*

I sacrifice to god the Beef which you adore.
I broyl thy Egyptian Eccles, which you (as god) implore:
You fear to eat the flesh of Swine; I find it sweet.
You worship Dogs; to beat them I think meet.
When they my store devour.

And in this manner Juvenal.

*Porrum, aut cape, nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!*

The Egyptians think it sin to root up, or to bite
Their Leeks or Onions, which they serve with holy rite:
O happy Nations; which of their own sowing
Have store of gods in every Garden growing!

§. IV.

That from the relics of Ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubal-Cain, &c.

But in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions upon stone or metal remaining after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the Son of Cham, who had learn'd the same of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah: for, all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fained: and though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro, Eusebius out of many prophane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have observed, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain, the Son of Adam, (as we have conceived) called and reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturnus for Jupiter was said to have invented the founding of Cities; and the first City of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochii, before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Hyginus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that many Cities were founded by divers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo Jove edificatam: yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter; seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochii were found after the Flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polzeus, Gen. 4. 16.

a Founder of Cities, and Hercules, an Incolfer, or strengthener of Cities (say Phorunus, and Pausanias;) and that to Jupiter Hercules, and there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And, that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that, soon after mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he delivereth in plain terms, in his third Book of Laws: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Jupiter of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the Son of Adam, who marrying his own Sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the City Henocho.

And besides this City of Henocho, Philo Judaeus conceiveth that Cain built six others, as Adach, Jared, Tobe, Jefca, Selt, and Gebat: but where Philo had this, I know not. Now, as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethnickes had the invention of Sacrifice: so were Jubal, Tubal, and Tubal-Cain (inventors of Paltorage, Smith-craft, and Music) the same which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercennus, Vulcan, and Apollo. And as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema, or Naamath, the Sister of Tubalcain, to signify Venus, or beautifull, Volutas, or pleasures; as the Wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Lady of pleasure and beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne; Cain, the eldest Jupiter; Eva, Rhea, and Nomea, or Naamath the first Venus: so did the Fable of the dividing of the World between the three Brethren, the Sons of Saturne, arise from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth between the three Brethren the Sons of Noah: so also was the fiction of those golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent which tempted Eva: so was Paradise it self transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the Prophecies, that Christ should break the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captivating Cerberus: so out of the taking up of Henocho by God, was borrowed the conversion of their Heroes (the inventors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Stars, and heavenly Signes, and (withall) that leaving of the World, and ascension of Astrea: of which Ovid;

Astrea last of heavenly Wights the Earth did leave.

For although thereby the Ethnickes would understand Justice it self to have failed, as No. Gen. 1. 2. c. 1. it is a vertue abstract, and may be considered without a person; yet, as it is usual among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beauty or Lust by Venus; so do they also the persons of men by like Vertues and Vices: and therefore by Justice and Astrea, Enoch; the justice, and piety of Enoch, being in the same manner expressed, as that of Noah was by Moses: for Noah Gen. 7. 1. was said to be a just man; And Noah walked Gen. 24. 14. with God. And of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away.

From that Story also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembereth the Giants begotten by the Sons of good men upon the Daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mighty men, and men of renown) did they steal those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerful Giants; and again, their Warr undertaken against the Gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as S. Augustine termeth him. Which war of their Giants, Cornelius Severus thus describeth.

Tentaverunt (nefas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captivique Jovis transferre Gigantes Imperium, & videri leges imponere caelo.

The Giants did advance their wicked hand Against the Stars, to thrust them headlong down;
And robbing Jove of his Imperial Crown,
On conquer'd Heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height; as God neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the Stars, should bury them under the moisture of a second Flood, but that by this building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven it self. Also the making of leagues, peace and covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by Sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Aeneids hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. who, when he read the Book of the Covenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternal Ancestor of Henocho and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Egypt which reigned at such time as Adams carried thence the

the children of Israel (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his Son and Successour Seth, of Seth: and of the same Seth (as many men of good judgment have granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Senthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memory of Seth most manifestly preserved, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient Parent, and of the first Tradition: in honour of whom they called a principal Province Sethetica. We also find in Bithynia the City of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kind of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquity preceding their own: and that they might not seem to learn elsewhere, they gave the same names to their own Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefeſt Jupiters, and the strange story of the third.

BUT of all those Armies of Jupiters, remembered by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers have also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Jupiter, the Son of Aether and Dies, so called because the one had reference to his Celestial conditions (for ether is as much as shining or pure fire): the other discovered his natural virtues, which daies and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the Son of Caelum or Heaven, for the same former respect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Aethens.

The third, of whom all the Grecian fables were devised, was of Crete (now Candia), the Son of Saturn and Ops. The name derived from the Latine is taken of Jovans pater, from the Greek word Zeus; it signifieth life, but somewhat strained. Boccas in his Genealogie of the Gods, conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiter the Planet; but whether that Star had such a name before the fable was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving, and faithful (that is) giving these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Jupiter: but howsoever they were, or were not with those virtues enriched, yet by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Surnames: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world (howsoever deserved) as the worthiest that ever were, acquired by their well-deservings. Jovis omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui, The ancients called all Kings Jupiters, as Thesius in his varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim Jovis vocarunt omnes; In old times all Nations call'd their Kings Jupiters. But where this last and moist remembered Jupiter was born, it is uncertain. Some there are, that make him of Crete: others that he was but sent thither by his Mother Ops, or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the fury of Titan his Uncle: because it was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn being a younger Brother, and reigning (for his own life) by Titan's permission, he should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any one of them in their succession; which agreement, because Saturn performed in his first born, it is feigned that Saturn devoured his own children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine:

Hand sit pinguis, Cruetis sepulcrum quod sit ipse filius.

Saturne to be the father is not known,
By being the grave and burial of his own;

This composition between Titan and Saturn, sybilla also witnesseth in these words;

Conceptis verbis, Titan jurare coegit Saturnum, de se natum ne nutriat ullum, Quo possint regnare, senis post fata, Nepotes.

Things thus agreed; Titan made Saturn his sweet
No Son to nourish, which by reigning might Usurp the right of Titans lawful heir.

But Ops the Mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno conveyed Jupiter (first called Lysianus) into Crete, as he did afterwards his two Brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnosus, the chief City of that Island, by Cressa the King, or by the Chreter, a people and nation thereof.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes and a Theban: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messina. The like contention is found among the Greeks touching his education and first fostering. Some affirm that he was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their black coats and and fkins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a God; others, that he was nourished by Bears: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greeks have many pretty tales. But in the end, when Titan had knowledge that Saturn had broken his faith, he set on him, and took him and his wife prisoners, whom Jupiter again rescued and delivered.

But lastly, the Father and the Son equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturn being the less powerful, fled into Italy, and left his Kingdom in Greece to his Son. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many virtues, the name of Jupiter was given him: yet after he was once settled, and became potent, he gave himself over wholly to palliarize and adultery, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as do ascribe the actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith satisfied, he was afterwards known to offend in the sin of Sodom with Ganimedes and others: and did not only begin with incest, marrying his own Sister Juno, but he ravished, betrayed, stole away, and took by strong hand all the beautiful women born in his time, within the limits of his own Kingdoms, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame; Niobe, Laodamia, and Alcmena, the Wife of Ampytrion, by whom he had Pelagus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the Mountain Taygetus took name; with another Son called Saon, of whom Savonas; by Antiope he had Ampion and Zetor: by Leda, Castor and Pollux, Hellen and Clytemnestra: by Danae, Perseus; by Jordana, Dencalion: by Charme (the daughter of Enubulus) Britomartus: by Proteogenia, he had Attilius the Father of Endymion: and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Aegyptus in Egypt: which Epaphus, married Libya, of whom that Country took name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. He ravished Aegina the Daughter of Aegleus, and carried her into the Island Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Aeanus: by Tortheia he had Aretheflaus and Carbinus: by Ora, Colaxes: he had also Dardanius by Elektra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilium or Troy. He begat the Brothers Talici, on Thalys; and on Garamantis, Hiarbas. He had besides these (if they bely not their chief God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inventors of the Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all these, who were born in Ages so far differing. And of these his several ravishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens Wives, Daughters, and Sons, buying of Virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into showers of Gold, Eagles, Bulls, Birds, and Beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans fear to entitle this Monster Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Book, de natura Deorum, affirm, that he deserved nothing less; and in his Oration, pro domo sua, reproacheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Jupiter. His burial was in Crete (saith Lucian). Cretenfer non solum natum apud se, & sepultum Jovem testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum ejus ostendunt; The *Crete*ans, or Candians do not only avow that Jupiter was born and buried among them, but they shew his Grave and Sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth; for in his time there remained the Monuments of his Tomb in the Mountain Jafus. This, Callimachus in his Hymns also witnesseth; but, as offended thereat, saith thus:

The *Crete*ans ever lyars were; they care not what they say:
For they a Tomb have built for thee, O King, that liv'st alway.

Diodorus Siculus tells by way of report from the Libyan Fables, confirmed (as he saith) by some Greek Writers, that the original of these Gods was from the Western parts of Africa. For there among the Atlantide reigned one Urannus (which significeth Heaven) called so, for his great skill in Astrology, and for his knowledg, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many Wives forty five Sons; but by his principal Wife Titea, he had seventeen Sons and two Daughters, all which were called after their Mothers name, the *Titane*s. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that she for her goodness was Canonized as a Goddess, being dead, and called the Earth, as her Husband was styled Heaven. But of all the children of Titea, her Daughter Rheia (which name founding as Queen in Englis, she is by the Latine translation of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in virtue as in years, was by general consent of her Brethren, and of the People, appointed to rule as Queen after her Father's death, being as yet a Virgin. She took to husband her Brother Hyperion, to whom she bare a Son and a Daughter, called Sun and Moon. The beauty and towardliness of these children moved her Brethren to envie, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they took the Boy and drowned drowned him in the River Eridanus, now called Poe. The loss of this child, caused his sister to break her own neck; and the loss of both her children, made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wild fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom she is said to have vanished away. Ere she died, her Son (as the Fable hath it) signified unto her in a Dream, that he and his sister, by the providence of God, should become immortal; that also the Sun and Moon should be called by their names, and that their death should be revenged upon the Murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withall held her self as a goddess; and teamed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly given to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilest they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other Sons of Urannus divided the Kingdom. Of these, Atlas and Saturn were chief. Atlas reigned over the Countries lying about the Mountains, which afterward bare his name; a just and wise Prince, deeply skillful in Astrology: and, for invention of the Sphere, said to have supported Heaven. He had many Sons; but the principal of them called Hesperus, being of his Fathers qualities and studies, was said to have been carried away by the Wind, from the top of an high Hill, in the midst of his contemplations; and his name, in honour of him, imposed by the people upon the morning Starr. The seven Daughters of Atlas were also said to have been excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or registered among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in quality to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seven Stars, called Pleiades, took name. Saturn, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italy. Jupiter, another of the Sons of Urannus, reigned in Crete; who had ten Sons, which he called Curetes: he called that Island after his Wives name, Idea; in which Isle he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not have been that great one, but Uncle to the great Jupiter, if these Fables of the Lybian were true. Saturn (as these Lybian tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keep his people in subjection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk, Hammon loving others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter called Minerva, neer to the River Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. He also begat on Amalthea, a Son, called Bacchus, whom he caused fe-cretly, for fear of his life, to be brought up at Nysa, an Island in the River Triton, under the tuition of his Daughter Amirva, and certain Nymphs. To Amalthea he gave in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Seacoast, bending in form like a Horn, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull Horn, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these news, she fled from her Husband to her brother Saturn, who, not only entertained her as a sister, but took her to Wife, and at her instigation, made warr upon Hammon, vanquished him by the assistance of the Titans, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before mentioned, held the Island at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon; after the name of Crete the Kings Daughter, whom he took to Wife, and had with her (women, as may seem, being very gracious in those names) the Kingdom. Bacchus was grown a proper young man, had found out the making of Wine, the art of planting of Trees, and many things else commodious for mankind, before the flight of his Mother-in-law. Now therefore, hearing report of all that had happened, and that Saturn was coming against him with the Titans; he levied an Army, to which the Amazons, living not far from Nysa, added great forces, in love of Minerva, who was entered into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they set forward against Saturn, met him, and overthrew him, and taking many of the Titans prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaved himself so well, that he won the love of all the people by whom he passed; in so much, that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturn's rigorous government, he was greatly strengthened, and the Enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. Coming to the City of Hammon, he won a battel of Saturn before the very walls. After which, Saturn, with his Wife Rhea, fled by night, letting the Town on fire, to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entertained. Saturn had a young Son by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child Bacchus took with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East-Countries: and coming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a Boy, Governour of the Country; but appointed unto him as an Over-seer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whilest Bacchus travelled through all Nations, as far as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titans had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to war upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerva, together with the rest, that afterwards were held gods, joining all their forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titans, chafed them, took and slew them, and freed the World of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were Deified; and the great Jupiter, the Son of Saturn, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone over all the world, having none of the Titans left alive, nor any other to disturb him. Between this tale of the Lybian gods, and the Egyptian Fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true History. For the Expeditions of Osiris and of Bacchus; the wars of the Giants in the one Story, of the Titans in the others: the Kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Lybian to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the Cymbals of Bastia, with many pretty circumstances, nearly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Saichoniate (as Ensebius cites him) would have all these to be Phœnicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true Story, and no Allegory. Yet he makes it seem the more allegorical, by giving to Uranus or heaven for daughters, Fate, and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus have enough. To the Genealogie, he adds Elinus, or the Sun, as father of Uranus, and among the children of Uranus, Jupiter, Betulus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withall to Uranus, the proper name of Terrenus, or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Crete.

The Pedigree of them is this:

S. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones; whereof some got some affected, the name of God.

OF Jupiter Belus, the Son of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three, by him remembered: for long after these times were the Greeks but Salvages, if they seek no farther off for their gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the Flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Jupiter) to entitle Cham, the Parent of their own Minxram, Jupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymology of this word (Hammon) which the Greeks deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Pencer) neither yet is his own much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth Heat: because the Temple of Jupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayre is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the Antiquity of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was born not long before the War of Troy, as by many of his Sons is made manifest; namely, Cæsar, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that Age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom, Troy was destroyed.

Now, seeing that mortal men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the Heathens; it was not to be wondered at, that Alexander, Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, fought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed Monsters as the rest: for by what reason could the same Deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora, which was given to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous Harlots, as the was.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

BUT that ever Pythagoras or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, believed in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (over-busily) have mixed their own inventions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiod in Hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the Books of Moses, as by places stolen thence, almost word for word, may appear; of which Justine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatise converted by Alirandula. As for Plato, though he dissembled in some things for fear of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet S. Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembered) Et mirum est delectans est, quæ de no Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Justine Martyr. Now, howsoever Laetantius pleaded to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge, from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Jews, and Books of Moses; * Ensebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, find reason to believe the contrary, thinking that from thence he took the grounds of all by him written of God, or favouring of Divinity: and the same opinion had S. Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanity, which possessed all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not under the right Authors names) those things which he had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the severity of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by whom he was put to death by poison; I cannot judge, them put to death by poison; I ascribe it to Justine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Plato's fear, whose words among many other of the same effect, are these: Plato, Moses mentionem facere, ob id, quod unus solusque Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putavit, veritus Areopagites, Plato, fearum the Areopagites, thought it not safe for him among the Athenians, to make mention of Moses, that he taught there is but one God. But for that Divinity which he hath, written in Timæo, Id ipsum de Deo discernit quod & Moses; He discoursed and taught the same of God (saith Justine Martyr) which Moses did. For, where it pleased God by his Angel to answer Moses, Ego sum existens, (which is) I Am; and, Existens nist me ad vos; I am hath sent me unto you; herein did Plato (saith Justine Martyr) no otherwise differ than that Moses used the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: Moses enim, qui existit inquit; Plato, quod existit for Moses saith, He who is; Plato, That which is. Now, of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or express the same, he giveth this testimony: Cantorem Universitatem hæc difficile est invenire, quam inventum impossibile dignè profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the Universal, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speak of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Majesty of Gods Nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus

n. 10.

bonus, & quidem Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (affuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is evil, he is no cause at all. And again, Caritas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the original of all things. Latrin. Apuleius the Platonist; Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci expanse, sed etiam nature dignitate: & nihil est Deo similis & gratus, quam vir animo perfectio bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignity of nature: neither is there any thing more like, or more acceptable to God, than a Man of a perfect heart. Thales affirmeth, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cepit, because he never had any beginning. Zeno, that God beheld even the thoughts of men; Athendornus, that therefore all men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, because God was every where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses story of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholar of Anaxagoras:

Cælum terraque unus forme fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abjuncta amplexu mutuo,
Emergit omnis in lucem rerum progenita;
Arbores, aëre, feræ, quæque assert mare,
Cunctique mortalium.

Heaven and Earth one form did bear:
But when dis-joyined once they were
From mutual embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato; so we find the same excellent understanding in Orpheus, who every where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God; though he use the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoid the envie and danger of the time: but that he could attribute those things to the Sons of men, and mortal creature, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no man, who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith Mirandula) quos Orpheus canit, non decipientium Demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtutum divinarumque sunt nomina. The names of those gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiving Devils, from whom evil comes, and not goodnes; but they are the names of natural and divine Vertues. Yea, that he reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himself, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymn following, teach us: Respicimus verò ad divinum hunc sermonem, et diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspicere mundi regem. Unus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse verò in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart, that's reason's sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one,
Begotten of himself, from whom is born alone
All else; in which he's still: nor could it ere befall
A mortal eye to see him once, yet he sees all.

And again the same Authour,

Jupiter omnipotens, et primus, et ultimus idem;
Jupiter est caput & mediū: Jovis omnia munus.
Jupiter est fundamen huius, & stellanti Olympi.
Jupiter & mas est, & femina nescia mortis.
Spiritus est cunctis, validi vis Jupiter ignis.
Et pelagi radice, Sol, Luna est Jupiter ipse.
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam prius oculuit; magno post numine sacrum
Cor referans, bonus in dulce dedit omnia lucem.

The first of all is God, and the same last is he God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be,
God is the base of Earth, and of the star-red skie.
He is the Male and Female too, shall never die.
The Spirit of all is God, the Sun and Moon, and what is higher.
The King th' original of all, of all the end.
For close in holy breast he did all comprehend, Whence all the blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now (besides these former testimonies) that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions; and leave the Readers to those large and learned Collections of Justine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eusebius, Pencer, Plessis, Dancus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these Attributes and properties: Bonus, justus, sanctus, sempiternus, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, solus, gloriosus, caritatis, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himself, profitable, beautiful, best, severe, free, alwaies doing good, safe without fear, glorious, and self-charity. Epicarmus affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced every Nature, was only and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus: Rex omnium ipse solus; He is the only King of kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus unus, Pater, creator summus atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversis secundum merita præbet; and Xenophon, Deus qui high Creator, and best artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Antisthenes) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known; Nisi in patria illa perenni, ejus imaginem nullam habes: Save only in that everlasting Country, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius: Unus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerful, neither corporally nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potentique, quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mighty; as is manifest to all: but of what Form he is, it is manifest to none, save only to himself, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum nature causa, & ratio, & origo Deus; summus animi genitor, æternus animantium diffusor, assidue mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore ullo comprehensibilis, eoque paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soul, the eternal preserver of living creatures, the continual framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can express what he is. Therefore was it said by Saint Hieron, Si enim cunctos Philophorum revoctos libros, necesse est ut in eis reperiamus aliquam partem vasorum Dei: ut, apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi Deum: apud Zenonem, Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the books of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as, in Plato, God the Creator of the world: in Zeno,

Hieron. in
Com. in
Gen. in Princip.

Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal Souls, &c. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall find that there never was man of solid understanding or excellent judgment; never any man whose mind the Art of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised; but that he hath found by an unreflexible necessity, one true God, and everlasting Being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly expressed, then that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it failed afterward in his posterity: all being at length by devilish policy of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Devil perwaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keep in awe and order their common people.

S. VIII.

That Heathenism and Judaism, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUT these are again vanished: for the inventions of mortal men are no less mortal than themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a god, is crept into every mans chimney, which the lack of Fuel starveth, Water quenched, and want of Air suffocated: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's Jealousies; Death hath perwaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea their stately Temples of Stone and dureful Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the Earth, nor any Monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lybia, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollo's Priests are become speechless, and the trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Devils telling men's fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and couzening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devil gave way to these his overthrows and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief mansions) was many times burnt;

burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and re-edified again, till by the hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubœan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly sack'd: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the son of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Army of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captains of the Phœnicians: Sixthly, by Nero: who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein again set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Army made spoil of, defacing as much as the time permitted them: notwithstanding all this, it was again gloriously re-built, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apollonia sent thither to know the success of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven, and the Image of Apollo himself, and all the rest of the Idols therein, molten down, and lost in the Earth.

The like success had the Jews in the same Julian's time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrow by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the ruins, and others slain and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jews, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith he, Allypius and the Ruler of the province of Judea, being by Julian busied in the re-edifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing near the foundation, and oft consuming the Workmen, made the Enterprize frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

Now the Devil, because he cannot play upon the open stage of this World, (as in those daies) and being still as industrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himself then ever. For whereas he first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead Stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idol of glory, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tells them that truth is the Goddess of dangers and oppressions, that chastity is the enemy of Nature, and lastly, that as all virtue (in general) is without taste; so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth every sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, then in the obtaining of power to oppress, and of riches to maintain plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Politian find in his Pupils any remorse, any feeling or fear of God's future judgments, he persuades them that God hath so great need of men's Souls, that he will accept them at any time, and upon any condition: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timely return towards God, by laying those great blocks of rugged poverty and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his divine presence. But as the mind of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and over-grown with grass, by which enter our charitable thoughts and divine contemplations: so hath that of Death a double and twofold opening, worldly misery passing by the one, worldly prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our sufferings and patience to attend us; (all which have gone before us to prepare our joys) at the other our cruelties, covetousness, licentiousness, injustice, and oppressions (the harbingers of most fearful and terrible sorrow) staying for us. And as the Devil our most industrious enemy was ever most diligent: so is he now more laborious then ever; the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and Time near at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's Flood.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane Testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's Flood.

OF this destruction it pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith Josephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Decedens cum suis in aliam regionem midam simul in Arca deducit in huius vertice hæsisse, lignorumque reliquias multo tempore conservatas, qui fortasse is fuit de quo etiam Moses Judeorum legislator scribit: thus far this Author. There is (saith he) above Midyada (or the Country of Minya) an exceeding high Mountain in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were saved in the time of the Deluge; and that one was carried in an Ark, and rested upon the top of the Mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the same of which Moses the Law-giver of the Jews makes mention. And of this opinion were the Talmudists (saith Annius) that many Giants saved themselves upon Mount Sion.

Hereof Nicolas Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Josephus. Est super Midyadam excelsus Mons in Armenia. I. l. c. 4. qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes fero et diluvii tempore liberatos, & quoniam gravit: He departed with his children, and travelled into another region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himself, Berosus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and unnatural wickedness, and that they were contemptors of religion and of the gods: among which mighty men (saith Berosus) unus erat qui deorum venerationis, & prudentior cunctis, &c. hinc nomen erat Noah: There was one more wise and reverencing the Gods then the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three Sons, Sem, Japhet, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the wife of Noah, (namely, Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preserved themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said unto Noah, Make thee an Arke of Fine-trees: thou shalt make cabins in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruel Generations were already fashioned in the Clouds, which soon after should swallow up and cover all living creatures which breathed in the Ayre, Noah and his family excepted.

But this universal grave of Waters, and general Deluge hath not been received by all: for divine testimonies do not persuade all natural men to those things to which their own reason cannot reach: Dum obvoluta in obscuro veritas latet: Whilest the truth lieth wrapt in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the universality of this Overflowing, and have judged that this flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdoms: moved to think, because in elder Ages there have been many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature.

Of the Flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noah's Flood.

§. II.

BUT from the vanity of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth (saith Laëtantius), who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquity, came the error first of all; who therein flattering themselves also, who therein flattering themselves also, were thought to persuade the World that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bœotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodiginus) Ogygium id appellat Poetæ, tanquam pervetus dixeris ab Ogyge vetustissimo: The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

But let Ogges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest that he lived but in Jacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was born 67. years after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogges was Cadmus (and then was he Europeus) as Rhodieus in the ninth Book fair later) as Antiquorum, of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Egypto regnasse autantem hunc; unde fit Cadmusque in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, & Bove jugulato he nuncupatus; quoniam Syrorum lingua Bœs dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who think that this Ogydes did reign in Egypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who travelling into Greece, built Thebes; so named of a Bœf slain; because in the Syrian Language, a Bœf is called Thebe.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the year of the World, 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the year 2242. after the same account: and so there came 1200. between these Floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now, although the very year and time of this overflowing in Arctia, or rather Arctica, be not precisely set down, but that there is a great difference among Writers; yet whosoever makes it most ancient, finds above 500. years difference between that and the general Flood.

For Paulus Orosius, affirms that this tempest fell upon the Arabians, but 1040. years before Rome was built. Bucholzzerus saith, it was 1043. elder than Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzzerus) in the worlds year, 2219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds year, 2280. Now, the general Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzzerus) 1563. years; and the Flood of Ogyges, (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference between these two Floods must be 520. years, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Pricus, as some do) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Africa, or Oegyria, did not extend it self any farther then the banks of Archi-plago, or the Æge- an Sea. For, whereas Mela, Pliny, and Soli- nus witness, that the City of Toppo in Jude- a was founded before the Flood; and that (not withstanding the height of waters) there remained on certain Altars of Stone, the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineas, with many of the grounds of their Religion:

sure it is no where found among prophane Historians, nor in the Scriptures, that ever the Flood of Ogges spred it self over any part of Syria, much less over all the Earth.
But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achata in Pe- loponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bu- ra were swallowed up (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus) : of which Ovid,

si queras Helicen, & Buran, Achaidos urbes, Ovid. Met.
Invenies sub aquis. l. 15. 303.

Eura and Helice, on Achaian ground, Are sought in vain; but under Sea are found.

Of this Floud of Ogyges, was invented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the Daughter of Cæus, the Son of Titan, being belov'd, and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be deliver'd unto withall, caus'd the monstrous Serpent Python, to follow and affright her, wheresoever she travelled; till at length arriving at the Isle of Ortygia, she was there receiv'd; in which she was deliver'd, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins; whereof Barlaam makes this expolition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges's reign) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mix'd) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogs, that in Attica, and along the coasts of the Ægean Sea, neither the beams of the Sun by day, nor of the Moon by night, could pierce the ayr, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipat'd) the ayr began to be clear, the people of Ortygia espied the light of the Moon somewhat before day, and in the fame morning the Sun also appeared: fabulously (because Diana reprehented the Moon, and Apollo the Sun) they were report'd to be born in the Isle of Ortygia, thereof afterwards call'd Delos; which signifieth Manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Floud of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories have have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, fensible discerned in those parts, and some unusual face of Skies. Varro in his Books, de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by S. Augustine) reports out of Cæsar, that so great a miracle hapned in the Star of Venus, as never was seen before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatness, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Astræus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians affirmed, in the time of Cæsar.

Now, concerning the course of that, or any other Planet, I do not need Astrologers, flourishing among the Greeks, or elsewhere in those days, as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets, so exact, that it should need no reformation: Of the colour and magnitudes I see no reason, why the difference found in the Star of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesser mists and fogs than those which covered Greece with so long darknesses, do familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sun and Moon. That the figure should vary, questionless it was very strange: yet I cannot hold it any prodigious: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sun beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite half should remain shadowed; whereby that Planet would, unto our eyes, display only that part whereon the light falleth, appear to be horned, as the Moon does seem; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Atlorgeron now living, who by the help of perspective Glasses, hath found in the Stars many things unknown to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to have been discovered in Venus, by his late observations. Whether some watry disposition of the ayr might represent as much to them that lived with Ogger, as Galleas hath seen through his Instrument; I cannot tell: for I am; that the discovery of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Ogger, was (as appeareth By this of S. Augustine) accompanied with such unusual (and therefore the more dreadful, though natural) signs; testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah, which was general, and altogether miraculous, may seem to have had no other token, or fore-shewing, than the long preaching of Noah himself, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came suddenly, and took them all away. Luke 17

v. 27.

§. III.

Of Deucalions Flood: and that this was not Noahs Flood: nor the Umbri in Italy, a remnant of any universal Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certain, was that of Ducaleon in Thelbeta; of which S. Angelin (ibit) regnante Atheniensibus Cranao, Juceffore Cereopris (us autem nostris, Euleubis & Hieronymis) adibus eodem Cereope permanentes, Diluvium fuit, quod appellatur et Ducaleonis: (that is) In these times, (as Varro reporteth) Cranaos the successor of Cereops governed the Athenians, or, (as our Euleubis and Hierome say) Cereops yet living, that Flood (called Dygylans) happened.

led Decalutions) happenca.

And in the beginning of the 11. Chapter of the 18. Book, he useth these words: Eduxit ergo Moyses ex Aegypto populum Dei novissimum tempore Cecropis Athenienium Regis, cum apud Alysios regnaret Alcatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Tripas: Moyses led the people of God out of Egypt about the latter time of Cecrops, King of the Athenians, Alcatades reigning over the Alysians, over the Sicyonians Marathus, and over the Argives Tripas. So as leaving the curiosity of a few years more or less, it appeareth, that this Flood of Decalution was either at the egression of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or near it: and then after Noah 753. years, according to Eunelius, who makes Cecrops to live in the year of the World, 2409. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. years after Noah, and in the year of the World 2395. But if Decalution were born in the age of the World 2356. according to Codomenus; then giving unto Decalution 40. years of age when this Flood happened, it falleth within one year of Mercators account. But Decalution, by all approved Historians, is said to have been 82. years old at that time. Now, Clementus Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood of Decalution, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëtons time, by the Reign of Crotopius, King of the Argives; but Crotopius lived King of the Argives six years after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twenty years difference, according to Funditus, who will have this Flood and Burning to have fallen 14. years before Moses left Egypt: for he gave of the Worlds years to the Flood and Burning, the year 2440. and to Moses egression the year 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks thinks that Moses was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the Burning of Phaeton preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Thebes (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. years, or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronology, makes it 230. and so doth P. Orosius: Eusebius about the 50. year of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noah's Flood 770. years: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Grecia tempore quidem Phorci, qui fuit post Inachum, inundatio que fuit tempore Ogygis: There happened in Greece, in the time of Phorneus, who lived after Inachus, the Flood of Ogyges. Now, if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. years before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius (as before); then it is manifest, that taking 762. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Flood happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250. years, or 260. years, according to the difference between the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my self (who rather follow these Chronologers, which give 60. years more to Abraham after the Flood, than the rest) I reckon the times which come between these Floods in this sort. The general Flood was in the year of the World 1656. so as from the beginning of the Flood to Jacob's birth, there were consumed 513. years. Ogyges Flood happened 100. years after Jacob was born; and therefore after the general Flood 613. years. Now, Deucalion was born in the year of the World 2356. and had lived 82. years, when his kingdom of Thebes was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his flood was after Noah's Flood ended, 782. years. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. years between the general Flood and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. years of his Age (as before) and then the flood of Thebes followed the general 782. years. The words of that Xenophon are these: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, secundo anno Spheri, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Thebasiam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the second year of Sphærus, are numbered 700. years, and when Deucalion was 82. years old, he saw Thebes fall drowned. This Flood happened in the Winter time about Paradise: witness Aristotle, in the first of his Meteor. And Varro (whom S. Augusline so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this flood of Deucalion to have hapned in the time of Cranæus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinks it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops: Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only over Thebes it self, and the Regions adjoining Westward, but it covered the greatest part of Italy: and either the same, or some other particular flood then hapning, oppressed Egypt, saith Eusebius. And therefore did the Greeks either think it, or feign it to be universal; and Deucalion the King, saving himself, and some others on the Mountain of Thebes (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to be the preserver of man-kind. That this flood covered a great part of Italy, Pliny, and Solinus make it probable, who affirm; that the people then inhabiting Italy, were therefore called Ogyges: quia ab imbris diluvii superfluent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Book, and Trezenius in his second: which Umbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brucii, and all other inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these Umbri were not the Inhabiters of Italy before the Flood of Noah, and so took name by saving themselves upon the Appennine Mountains, the Scriptures teach us; shewing who, & who only then were preserved, which is sufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling us, that the first people which after the general Flood inhabited Italy, were the Cameneses; (so named, from Camese, whom Cato in Origines, another of Annius his Authors, names for a consort of Janus) which people lived altogether a savage life; till such time as Saturn arriving on those Coasts, devised Laws to govern them by: the memory of whose Acts in that Region, Diodore and Thallus among the Greeks; Nepos, Callinus, and Varro among the Latines, have preserved; and of whom Virgil:

Primus ab æthere venit Saturnus Olympo, Arma Jovis fugiens, & regni exul adeptus. Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus altis Compositum, legesque dedit; Latiniq; vocari Maluit.

Saturn descending from the heavens high Fearing the Arms of Jupiter his Son, His Kingdom, left, and banisht thence, doth fly, Rude people on the Mountain tops he won To live together, & by Laws which done, He chose to call it Latium.

And

And afterwards in the Verses following he speaketh of the Aufones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which again sought to dis-plant the antient Inhabiters:

Fig. 1. 8. Thus manns Aufonia, & gentes venere Sicani.

Then came th' Aufonian Bands, and the Sicani Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spain, and late down in Italy) Thucydides and Pliny give testimony: who were again expelled by the Ligii, saith Thucydides. After all these Plantations and re-plantations, came the Umbri, defended of the Gauls (saith Annius) not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italy, even all Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Pliny, and Dionysius have assured us: and therefore this Flood of Deucalion, was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italy, and dispossed of Italy again, before the Umbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that Kingdom was first called Camafene, then Latium or Saturia, then Aufonia, then Sicania; before the Umbri (in whose time Deucalions Flood happened) possed'd the same, about 306. years before the War of Troy; Lycaon then governing Arcadia: who being the Father of two and twenty Sons, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italy, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italy of the same Nation changed it into Italy, after his own name, about 250. years before the fall of Troy. After these, came the Pelagi, of whom Pliny in his third Book and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his sixth, speak at large: and after them the Lydi, under Tyrribenus their Captain, that gave name to the Tyrrheni, who calling thence the Umbri, took from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelve Cities; to which (after they had possed'd and past over the Appennine Mountains) they added divers others, whereof Telsina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not antiently such a Nation as these Umbri in those parts, I do not affirm; having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was derived from the Greek word Ombros; but that these Umbri of Italy were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

§. IV.

Of some other Records: testifying the universal Flood: and of two antient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

Saint Augusline out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greeks and Latines made not any mention of the Universal Flood, because they had nothing of Antiquity foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembered) were all things among the Greeks (which antiquity had worn out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worm-eaten, or) of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did every Family, which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledge of divine Letters was not received, find no Parent of more antiquity; then such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their own; and as the Grecians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigene, and growing out of the Earth, or invent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certain knowledge of Noah's Flood, as Serapion witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirm by hear-say, that some Giants saved themselves upon the Mountain Araris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authority approved: using the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembereth a place out of the antient Historian Abydenus: who writeth, that Sisithrus, to preserve himself from a Flood, fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armeniam navigio confugibat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth Birds, that finding no Land to rest on, returned again; which he also did a second time; but at the third return, the Birds feet were covered with mud and slime. To this effect are Eusebius's words out of Abydenus, which may seem a true description (though in other terms) of Noah's Flood.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this general Flood. And Plato in Timæus produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Books of Egypt, the story of the Flood universal, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian Inundations. Frier Annius his Xenophon remembereth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth; somewhat more antient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the general Flood for the first, which happened (saith he) under the old Ogyges; sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah. He called the second, Niliaca; Hercules and Proclitus then living, 44. years before that the Assyrians, though I do not believe him as touching the time. But this Flood covered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all the Region subject to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his Liver, afterward slain by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus delivereth in these words: *Fluvium propter cursum velocitatem profunditatemque aquarum, Asus velocitatem profunditatemque aquarum, Aquam tunc appellatum, Herculeum, tum confilium magnitudinem, tum virtutem, voluit et vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum converterisse. Unde & Graeci quidam Poeta, rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, Herculem tradunt Aquilam Promethei Jecur depulcentem occidisse: This Flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftness of his course, as also for the depth, was in those days called the Eagle: but Hercules by his great judgment and virtue did again compress and straighten this River, so far extended and over-spread, turning it into the old channel: Whence certain Greek Poets (converting this labour and work of Hercules into a fable) devised, that Hercules slew the Eagle which fed on Prometheus liver, meaning that he delivered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the loss of his people and Country (by the Waters destroyed and covered over) he suffered.*

A fourth Flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Amnius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in his brief fort writeth of all these Inundations: *Inundationes plures fuerunt: prima novembris Inundatio terrarum sub prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations: (saith the same Xenophon:) the first, which was universal, of nine moneths; and this happened under the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one moneth continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two moneths, under Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three moneths, in Thessalia under Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance, (called Pharonica) under Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helen's rape. Diodorus, in his fifth Book and eleventh Chapter, taking the Samotheas for his Authors, remembereth a Flood in Asia the less, & else where, of no less destruction then any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of *Pontus and Hellepont breaking in over the Land. But there have been many Floods in divers times and Ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembered, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the year of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same year, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a marvellous Overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian Territory, and in Liguria; accompanied with a most fearful storm of Thunder and Lightning, after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast up and left upon the land after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the year 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, in the year 1238. Tribemius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a Flood in Frisland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Silvius in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italy, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicily were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixth: also in the year 1515. Maximilian being Emperour. He also remembereth a perilous over-flowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Vignier, a French Historian, speaketh of a great Flood in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in Anno Domini 1557. with so dreadful a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Judgment-day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountain, about Nisius, there were removed divers old heaps and moutures of ground, and many other places torn up and rent: by which accident there was found both coyn of Silver and Gold, divers pieces of Plate and Vessels of other Mettal, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that Province, in the year 1156.

§. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernatural, though some say it might have been foreseen by the Stars.

Now, howsoever all these Floods, and many other, which have covered at several times, several Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I have learned of some ancient Southlayers among them) may be ascribed to natural causes and accidents; yet that universal Flood

Flood (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the Earth by a power above Nature, and by the especial commandment of God himself; who at that time gave strength of influence to the Stars, and abundance to the Fountains of the deep: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible than any ability of nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoever union, could perform, without receiving, from the Fountain of all power, strength and faculties supernatural. Henricus Decolinienfis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Alba Masar, observeth, that before the Flood of Noah, the like Conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation, since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Flood of Noah might be foretold, because Cancer is both a watry Sign, and the House of the Moon, which is the Lady of the Sea, and of moisture, according to the rules of Astronomy, and common experience.

And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco upon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Flood by divine revelation, (yet this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signs, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himself: and further, that by Cataractae celi, Englished the Windows of Heaven) Moses meant this great and watry Conjunction; the word Cataractae, signifying flowing down, or coming down. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordain by the course of the Heavens such a Constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked ways wherein they walked, and call unto God for mercy.

Of this judgment was Gul. Parisiensis, who understood, that the words Cataractae celi, or Windows of Heaven, were to be taken for the former Conjunction, or for those watry signs, Cancer, Fishes, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moon: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His own words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebraeorum Cataractae celi vocasse, nisi partes illas celi, quae generative sunt pluviarum & inundationum Aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceive not what the Prophet of the Hebrews meant by those words (Cataractae celi, or Windows of Heaven) unless he thereby understood those celestial powers, by whose influences are engendered the rain and inundations of waters, such as are the watry signs of Cancer, &c. But, in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his unsearchable wisdom this Conjunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) add vigour and faculty, and gave to every operation increase of virtues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountains, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heap of their waters; taking retention from the clouds, and sending airy into water by the ministry of his Angels, or whatsoever else best pleased his All-powerfulness.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the universal Flood: And what are Cataractae celi, Gen. 7. v. 11.

Now, if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God refted the seventh day: (that is, he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seem that then all the Earth and Ayr had not waters sufficient to cover the habitable World fifteen cubits above the highest mountains. Of this proposition, whether God had so restrained himself, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is); that the World had want of water to over-cover the highest mountains, I take that conceit to be unlearned and foolish; for it is written, That the Fountains of the great deep were broken up, (that is) the waters forsook the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoever was dispersed therein, pierced, and brake through the face thereof. Then let us consider, that the Earth had above one and twenty thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth, according to that circle, seven thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center, some three thousand five hundred miles. Take then the highest mountain of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the mountains of Armenia, or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tennesis, and I do not find, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth above thirty miles upright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deep, should not well help to cover the space of thirty miles in height; this thirty miles upright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and sixteen times: for the Fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the waters drawn out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayr over and above it, we shall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayr, as every where compasseth and imbraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conversion of Ayr into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seem strange to men of judgment, yea, but of ordinary understanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was covered over with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly, For the opinions of Galichum Parisiensis, and Aliacensis; to which I may add Berosus, and others, That such a conjunction there was, fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Cataractæ Cæli, or Windows of Heaven, was meant this conjunction; there needs no other answer than that observation of Ludovicus Vivæ, who affirmeth, That by the gravest Astrologian it was observed, that in the year 1524. there should happen the like conjunction as at Noah's Flood; than which (saith he) there was never a more fair, dry, and seasonable year: The like destruction was prophesied, of the year 1588. But Picus Earl of Mirandula proveth, that there could not be any such conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mystérie in the word Cataractæ Cæli, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses using the word Windows of Heaven (if that be the sense of the word) to expels the violence of the Rains, and pouring down of Waters. For whosoever hath seen those fallings of the Indies, which are called the Spouts, (where clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a restless violence in one body) may properly use that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windows, or Flood-gates of Heaven opened: (which is) That Waters fell contrary to custom, and that order which we call natural. God then loosened the power retentive in the uppermost ayr, and the Waters fell in abundance: Behold (says Job) the withholdeth the Waters; and they dry up (or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur; And all things are dried up) but when he sendeth them not, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26 Chapter: He bindeth the waters in the clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the general Flood, and called up the Waters which slept in the great Deep; and these joyning together, covered the Earth, till they performed the work of his will: which done he then commanded them to return into their dark and vast Caves; and the rest (by a Wind) rarified again into ayr, formerly condensed into drops.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

Noah, commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entered the Ark which he had built, with his own Wife, and his Sons, and his Sons Wives, taking with them of every Creature which took life by generation, seven of the clean, and of the unclean, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth Quietness: after others, and according to the Prophecie of his Father Lamech, Celsation; to whom afterwards gave many Names, answering his Antiquity, Zeal, Virtue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogges, there was also a great Flood of Abbas: Satur they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gave him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steal away Jupiters fire; Fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others think, that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the Name of Janus, (id est) Vinofus, because Jain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian finds him written in libris Ritualibus, in the Book of Ceremonies, preceding both satur, Uranus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time then all the other ancientest feigned gods. And this Name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in use before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdom by that Name known. Of the antiquity of Janus, Fabius Pistor giveth this testimony: *Jani etate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus peioribus nondum haberat ulla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vimum & Far primus populus docuit Janus ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomeria & Sacra docuit; In the time of Janus (saith he) there was no Monarchy: for the desire of rule had not then folded it self about the hearts of men. Janus first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meal: he first set up Altars, instituted Gardens, and solitary Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimony than this there cannot be found among all the Heathen, which in all agree so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilst Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that took on him sovereign Authority. Secondly, Noah, after the Flood, was the first that planted the Vine, and became an Husband-man; and therefore offered the first-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and* and Meal. Thirdly, he was the first that raised an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God a thanksgiving for his merciful goodness towards him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Janus) because he beheld the times both before and after the Flood. Quia preterita novit, & futura profecerit, saith Arnobius: Be- cause he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Janus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The seed of the World: because, as out of that confused Heap was drawn all the kinds of Beasts and Plants; so from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ovid in the person of Janus:

McChaos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant: Affice quam longi temporis astra cano!
The Ancient call'd me Chaos: my great years
By those old times, of which I sing, appear.

He was also intitled Cælum and Sol, Heaven and the Sun, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomy: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodisiens so call, because he was the restorer of the Greeks to their former liberty, but in respect of the Flood. For the Greeks called Liber yā, and his Nurses Hyades, of Rain, because Noah entered the Ark when the Sun joynd with the Stars Hyades, a constellation in the Brow or Neck of Taurus, and ever after a Monument of Noah's Flood. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a Marine god, the Son of Neptune; because he lived in safety on the Waters. So was he known by the name of Dionysus, quasi dionysos, mentem pungens, Bite-brain, or Wit-stinger; though Diodorus conceive otherwise, and derive that name à Patre & Loco; of his Father and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Jove, and Nisa, a Town of Arabia felix, saith Suidas, out of Orpheus. He had also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; because he first yoked Oxen, and Tilled the ground: according to that of Moses; and Noah became an Husbandman. Now howsoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus, (otherwise Dionysus) it is certain, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stolen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more antiently Bocchus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danens) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the first and antient Bacchus) were all those fables devised, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Book and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was surnamed Nysus, of the Mountain Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus never came, whatsoever themselves feign of his enterprises: and these Mountains of Nysa joynd with those of Paropamisus, and those other Eastern Mountains, on which the Ark of Noah rested after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memory of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserved, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bear his Name, with many Rivers and Mountains; which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many Names given him, brought the same confusion to places as to himself. Notwithstanding all which, we find the City of Noah upon the banks of the red Sea, and elsewhere: the River of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Phlomy, Danus; dividing Illyria from Pannonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

Now in what part of the World Noah built the Ark, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither do I find any approved Author that hath written thereof; only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiveth, that Noah built his Ark near the Mountains of Caucasus, because on those hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the war among the people, called Nysæi, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchres wrought over with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himself from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God and Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Ark; to which also he addeth the conveniency of Rivers, to transport the Timber which he used, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only this we are sure of, that the Ark was built in some part of the Eastern World; and to my understanding, not far from the place where it rested after the Flood. For Noah did not use any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Ark no otherwise move, than the Hulk or body of a Ship doth in a calm Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continual and down-right Rains, there were any Winds at all, therefore was the Ark little moved from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God Gen. 8. 1. made a Wind to pass upon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storm or forcible wind at all, which could drive the Ark any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted up. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Ark had fundum planum, a flat bottom, and not rayed in form of a Ship, with a sharpness forward, to cut the Waves for the better speed.

This kind of Vessel the Hebrews call Thebet, and the Greeks Larnax, for so they termed Domation Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight days he arrived, was first called Larnax, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Vasfianus thinks that it took name of a Son of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the Inventor of Anguration.

Pocernus finds the word (Parnassus) to have no affinity with the Greek, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nahar, which signifieth Anguration and Draination; or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles, in the Leaf before cited.

Josephus calls the Ark, Machina, by the general name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lieth the difference between Aron and Thebet, That Aron signifieth properly the Ark of the Sanctuary, but Thebet such a Vessel, as swimmerth, and beareth it self upon the Waters.

Lastly, this Ark of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship, in this, that it had a Cover and Roof, with a Cleft in the middle thereof, and the sides declining like the Roof of an House; to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himself and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noyfulness of the many Beasts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the Ark.

Of what Wood the Ark was built, it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher once, and in this place only used, is diversely understood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Translation calls it Pine-tree; that the Geneva Cedar; the Seventy, square Timber, the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will have it Cypress Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypress is worn at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signify any special kind of Timber, Noah obeyed

the voice of God therein; If not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, having the promise of God, and his Grace and mercy for his defence: For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinius affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the use to build Ships of Cedar, which the worms eat not; and he avoweth, that he saw in Utica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beams, laid in the time of the foundation of the City, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. years after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not subject to putrifying or mouldring in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carry, and of a fitter favour, lasting also better than any other wood, and because neerer the place where the Ark rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the Mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus; it is probable enough that the Ark might be of that wood: which hath, beside the other commodities, the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build Ships withal. Pocernus conceiveth, that the Ark had divers sorts of Timber, and that the bottom had of one sort, the deck and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in general. True it is, that Cedar will serve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabins; thereby to sever the clean Beasts from the unclean, and to preserve their several sorts of Food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Compass or the North Star. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have been a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantity about the Vally of Sodom and Gomorrab, now the dead Sea, or Asphalter, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sun, but by the Fire only, after the manner of hard Wax.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

The Ark, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred Cubites

Cubites, fifty of breadth, and thirty deep or high: by which proportion, it had six parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine: Proculdubio figurat est peregrinatio in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei. (hoc est) Ecclesie que sit fabra per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Jesus Christus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisque ejus significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines primum, manum, in cuius veritate ad homines primum, venit, Sec. Without doubt (saith he) it is a Figure of the City of God travelling in this world as a stranger, (that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree, whereupon the Mediator between God and Man, the Man Jesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, height and breadth, unmeasure the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

By what kind of Cubit the Ark was measured, it hath been a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the common) containeth one foot and a half, measured from the sharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palm-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three inches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commensurate, the alteration and diminution of mens measures hath made the difference. For as there is now a less proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit from the sharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of less length than it was in elder times.

Saint Augustine, considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Ark held, with their food and water, was sometime of opinion, that the Ark had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost six of the common: For, measuring the Ark by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacity of that Vessel built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolemy Philopater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his judgment as touching the Geometrical Cubit, and found, upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kinds of Fishes into the Ark, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their own Element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca que possent in aquis vivere, non solum versata sunt Pisces, verum super-nantantia, sicut multa aliter: it was not needfull to conserve those creatures in the Ark, which could live in the water, but also those Fowls which sit and swim on them. And again, Terra, non aqua, maledicta est, quia Adam non hujus, sed illius fructum vetulum comedit: it was the Earth, and not the Water: which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth and not of the Sea, did Adam eat. So, as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.

And if we look with the eyes of judgment hereunto, we shall find nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischief and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, found many impossibilities in this work of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seem differing, and of several kinds, were not then in rerum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was their they were not to preserve them, seeing they not needfull to be generated again by others: as the Mules, the Hyenas, and the like; the one begotten by Asles and Mares, and the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by differing of strange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beasts and Birds, differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which were red and pied skins, or feathers, are differing from those that are less painted, and wear plain russet or black; they are much mistaken that so think. And for mine own opinion, I find no difference, but only in magnitude, between the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India; and even those Dogs which are become wild in Hispaniola, with which the Spaniards used to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattel, and do also oftentimes tear asunder their own Children. The common Crow and Rook of India is full of red feathers in the drownded and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with black and carnation in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then then were the Nigro's, which we call the Black-Beasts, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts; and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, than the people of this part of the World. We also see daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Climate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting; and the best Melons will change in a year or two to common Cucumbers, by being set in a barren soil. Therefore, taking the kinds precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Ark after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we add but half a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a half of Giant stature (and less allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the Ark contain 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in breadth, and 60. foot in depth.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not used in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Og, King of Bashan, had been nine Geometrical Cubits long, it had taken 54. Cubits of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of six Cubits and an handful, which makes nine foot and a handful (a proportion credible) if these Cubits had been Geometrical, then had been 54. foot in height, and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath been nine foot long, and far weightier and bigger then all David's body, who carried it away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had been used for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters have observed, then had the Altar (appointed to contain five Cubits of length, five of breadth, and three of height) reached the length of 27. foot upright, and so must their Priests have ascended by steps or Ladders to have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to Gods Commandment, given in these words: Thou shalt not go up with steps unto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make four foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office. Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinary Cubit of one foot and a half, according to the measure of Giant stature; which measure (doubtless) might give much the more capacity to the Ark; although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the horses whereon they rode, and all other Creatures of a correspondent size. And yet, (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Ark, it were not hard to conceive, how all the distinct species of Animals, whose lives cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a Vessel of those dimensions which the Ark had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a half of our now usual measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large bodies which were in the days of Noah, might have room sufficient in the Ark, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of Creatures to be saved, (that is, seven of the clean, two of the unclean, with necessary food) might have place in the Ark, Buto hath very learnedly declared: the brief sum of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Ark was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty Cubits, and the product by the height of thirty Cubits, sheweth the whole Capacity to have been 450000. Now, whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seem to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the height of the roof, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500. cubical Cubes was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatness we seek room for 89. distinct species of Beasts, or (least any should be omitted) for 100. several kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bigness are no way answerable to them; and for meat to sustain them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantity best known; the Beef, the Sheep, and the Wolf: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to four Beesves, one Lion to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feed on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number only three are clean, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entered into the Ark, namely, three couples for breed, and one odd one for sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kind, so that in all there were in the Ark one and twenty great Beasts

Beasts clean, and six and fifty unclean, estimable for largeness as ninety one Beesves; yet for a supplement (left perhaps any species be omitted) let them be valued as an hundred and twenty Beesves. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Ark six and twenty kinds, estimable, with good allowance for supply, as fourscore Sheep. Of those which devour flesh were two and thirty kinds, answerable to threecore and four Wolves. All these two hundred and eighty Beasts might be kept in one story or room of the Ark, in their several Cabins; their meat in a second: the Birds and their provision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his Family, and all their necessities.

That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East-Indies, and Scythia.

||. I.

A Præterition of some Questions less material: with a Note of the use of this Question to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

What time Noah took to build the Ark, I leave to others to dispute: but he received the Commandment from God an hundred years before the Waters fell; and had therefore choice of time, and leisure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into four, Saint Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controversy: or, whether those Creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-Cows, or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Ark, or no, I think it a needless curiosity; and yet to this faith Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-pool might be made as well within the Ark, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who suppose that the Ark was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystal to receive in Light, and keep out Water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfy my self and others in, is, In what part of the World the Ark rested after the Flood: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the seat of the terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Ark) do onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all Story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

||. II.

A Proposal of the common opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Ark rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travelled to their first settlement and plantation, I am resolved (without any presumption) that therein the most Writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led to think out of any Humour, or newness of opinion, or singularity; but do herein ground my self on the original and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that upon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, That the Ark stayed upon one of the mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath converted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordai, or Gordiei, in Armenia the greater (as the words Gordai, and Kardu, seem to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are: I find neither Scripture nor Reason which reacheth any such thing (toward) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this Mountain of Ararat, Baris; being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which Mountain the Frier Anninus (citing this place out of Josephus) makes him find another adjoining, called Ocila, and to say that the Ark (of which Moses the Law-giver of the Hebrews wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I do not find any such Mountain in being, as this Ocila, neither is there any mention of it in the place of Josephus. Strabo remembereth a Promontory in Arabia Felix of that name; and Pliny finds a Mart-town so called in the same, which Ptolemy calls Ocilia, Pinetus Agyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Anninus, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian Mountains. Berosus calleth those Mountains of Armenia Gordai, and Curtius Cordai: Ptolemy Gordai and Gordai: of which the Country next adjoining is, by Hiero 51. 27. perhaps (as Becanus conjectures) for Nislyada, or rather Damn: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seems to be compounded of this word Minus, and Aram: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Pliny witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cordaces about these Mountains, whom others call Gordani or Gordani. The Mountains are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the Mountains called Taurus, or Niphates, in the Plains of Armenia the great, near the Lake Tlositis: whence the River of Tygris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. & 52. degrees of latitude. One of the Mountains, Gordie (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Josephus. Which name (saith Junius) was of the event, because of Noah's coming down with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed event: seeing any Hill from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Jupinus corrects the place in Josephus (Kulavris). That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, because Joseph. 1. 1. c. 4. says, the place is called Asur (as it were the descent or coming down) and Epiphanius lib. 1. contr. Here he calls it Asur, which word in the Armenian and Egyptian Tongue signifieth Descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seem to be derived; and As 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath been embraced from Age to Age, receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given, especially to that Mountain, by reason that the passage was more fair, up and down unto it, than to any of the rest adjoining.

|| III.

The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

But there are many Arguments to persuade me, that the Ark of Noah did not rest it self in any part of Armenia, and that the Mountain Ararat was not Barb, nor any one of the Gordian Mountains.

For the first: It is agreed by all who follow Berosus, that it was in the year 130. or in the year 131. after the Flood, when Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward call'd Babylonia, Chush, and Chaldea. If then the Ark had first found

Land in Armenia, it is very improbable, that the children of Noah, which came into that Valley, could have spent so many years in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interjacent, which might by easie journeys have been past over in twenty days; and to hasten and help which passage, the navigable River of Tygris offered it self, which is every where transpassable by Boats of great burthen: so as where the Descent on the one side rescited their expedition, the River on the contrary side served to advance it; the River rising out of the same Ledge of Mountains, or at the foot of them, where the Ark of Noah was first supposed to settle it self; Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second Flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it foundeth ill to the ear of reason, that they would have spent many years in that low and overflown Valley of Mesopotamia, so called, of the many Rivers which imbroider or compass it: for the effects witnessed their affections, and the works which they undertook, their unbelief; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, but they began to provide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared Inundation. Now, at Babel it was, that Nimrod began his Kingdom, the first known City of the World, founded after the Flood, about 131. years, or (as others suppose) ten years later: though (for my self) I rather think that they undertook that work in two respects; first, to make themselves famous, To get us a name (saith the Text): Secondly, thereby to usurp dominion over the rest.

|| IV.

The second Argument; That the Eastern People were most ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

For a second Argument: The civility, magnificence, and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the World first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noah's taking Land there. And that this is true, the use of Printing and Artillery (among many other things which the East had) may easily persuade us, that those Sun-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certainty of this report, that the East-Indians (time out of mind) have had Guns and Ordinance of battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make us now to understand, That the place of Philoftratus in vita Apollonii lonii Tiani, L. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expressed in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell between Hyphasis and Ganges, use not themselves to go forth into Battel: but that they drive away their Enemies with Thunder and Lightning sent from Jupiter. By which means there is said, that Hercules Aegyptius and Bacchus, joyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden Shield. For the invention of Letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that Letters are no less ancient then Seth or Henech were: for they are said to have written on Pillars of Stone (as before remembered) long before the Flood. But from the Eastern world it was that John Guibenberg a Germane, brought the device of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicolaus Gersoun a Frenchman, bettered both the Letters and Invention. And notwithstanding that this Mystery was then supposed to be but newly born, the Chinois had Letters long before either the Egyptians or Phoenicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greeks had neither any civil knowledge, or any Letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witnessed, who about an hundred years since discovered those Kingdoms, and do now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinois account all other nations but salvages in respect of themselves.

And to add strength to this argument, the conquest and story of Alex. Macedon may justly be called to witness, who found more Cities and sumptuousity in that little Kingdom of Porus, which lay side by side to the East India, then in all his other travails and undertakings. For in Alexander's time, learning and greatness had not travelled so far to the West as Rome. Alexander esteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Country, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his ears. And if we look as far as the Sun-rising, and hear Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermost Angle and Iland thereof, we shall find that those Nations have sent out, and not received; learned knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more civil; the farther West, the more Salvage. And of the Isle of Japan (now Zi- pingari) Venetius maketh this report: Incole religioni, literis, & sapientia sunt addictissimi, & voratiss indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) facris in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant: The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and philosophy, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians: They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquity, magnificence, civility, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be such by those who have been employed in those parts, as it seemeth to exceed (in those formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other Kingdoms of the World.

|| V.

The third Argument, from the wonderful resemblance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

But for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the invasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and advised Reader: who may consider in what Age she lived, and how soon after the Worlds new birth she gathered her Army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesius reporteth) of more then three millions to invade India, to which he adjoynd also 50000. Horses, and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we believe but a third part, it shall suffice to prove that India was the first planted and peopled Country after the Flood. Now as touching the time wherein she lived: All Historians consent that she was the Wife of Ninus, and the most approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Son of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Son of Chush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the City and Tower of Babel may appear; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast between Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Army was composed. Let us then see with whom she encountered in that War with this her powerful Army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her own, conducted by Staurabates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diod. Siculus; Staurabates caeteris majoribus, quam que erant Semiramidis, copijs: Staurabates gathering together greater Troops than those of Semiramis. If then these numbers of Indians had been increased but by a Colony sent out from Shinaar (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt took some time in the performance) this increase in the East, and this Army of Stanrobates must have been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow up in that time, from so great a Troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Story of Iffrael) so could not any such time, by any multiplication natural, produce so many bodies of men as were in the Indian Army victorious over Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had been so late as Babel overturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if we allow 65 years time after the Flood, before Nimrod was born: of which, thirty years to Cush ere he begat Seba, after whom he had Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then thirty years to Raamah, ere he begat Gen. 10. 7. Sheba and Dedan, both which were born before Nimrod: and five years to his five elder Brothers, which make sixty five, and then twice thirty years for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba, and Dedan with others, to beget their Sons; and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all an hundred twenty five years; there will then remain six years to have been spent in travelling from the East, ere they arrived in Shinaar, in the year after the Flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the year 101, and the Confusion to have been at Peleg's birth, these men do all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the help of time; and build Nimrod's Tower in the Ayr; and not on those low and marshy grounds (which require found foundations) in the Plains of Shinaar. For except that huge Tower were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that year 101. or at Peleg's birth. And therefore it is far more probable, that Nimrod usurped Regal authority in the 131. year after the Flood (according to Berosus) and that the Work of Babel lasted forty years (according to Glycas) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vain 40. years to finish it. By which account it falls out that it was 170. years after the Flood, ere a Colony was sent into East India; which granted, (the one being the main Body, and the other but a Troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed that Stanrobates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Empress of all that part of the world gathered the most of Nations into one body.

M 2 gather

¶ VI.

The fourth Argument from divers considerations in the person of Noah.

Fourthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the Flood, and had lived therein the long time of 600. years, was all that space 130. years after the Flood without any certain habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Western World; (which Travails Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himself, then covered with many years, planted himself in the same place which God had assigned him; which was, where he first came down out of the Ark from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came down out of the Ark, he planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman, whose business was to dress and manure the Earth; and not to range over so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where he should (if the Tradition be found) have left certain Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton: then into Spain where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his Sons Wives: from thence into Italy, where they say he found his Son Cham the Saturn of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the story) had patience for three years; but then finding no amendment, they say he banish'd him out of Italy. These be but the fancies of Berosus Anniarius, a plain imitation of the Grecian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to travail far in such a Forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the Earth by the Flood, the same lay wast and over-grown for 130. or 140. years, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creep for Woods, Bushes, and Bryers, that in those years were grown up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah never came into the Valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spain: For Noah who was Father of all those Nations, a man revered both for

for his Authority, Knowledge, Experience and Piety, would never have permitted his children and issues to have undertaken that unbelieving presumptuous work of Babel. Rather by his presence and prevalent persuasions he would have bound their hands from so vain labours, and by the authority which he received even from God himself, he would have held them in that awful subjection, as, whatsoever they durst not have disobeyed the personal commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kind of Regal authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of man-kind was by themselves purchased through cruelty and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay upon them the same, if not a more sharp affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came so far West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troop, because they had the greatest part of the World to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nauclerus, and Celsinus, take the testimony of Melchiodorus Bishop of Tyre for current, that there were three Leaders of the people after their increase (to wit) Nimrod, Saphene, and Joathan, of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Joathan of Sem, and Saphene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a work as the Worlds Plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sons of Sem: Joathan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East-India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia, and the other adjoining to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sons of Joathan, or of all the rest a certain number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himself, it cannot be known. Of which Plantation I shall speak at large in the Chapter following.

Now, another reason which moves me to believe that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinaar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the Story of the Hebrews, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah being the Father of all man-kind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principal a Person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the World) withdrawn himself, and rested a-part with his best Beloved, giving himself to the service and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile soil, where he planted his Vineyard, and dressed the Earth; after which, and his thanksgiving to God by sacrifice, he is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so far away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

¶ VII.

Of the senseless opinion of Annius the Commentator upon Berosus: who finds divers places where the Ark rested, as the Caspian and Gordian Hills, which are three hundred miles asunder; and also some places of Scythia.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and Authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Berosus and others, laboureth marvellously to prove that the Ark of Noah rested upon the Armenian Mountains called Cassii; which Mountains separate Armenia from the upper Media, and do equally belong to both. And because all his Authors speak of the Mountains of Gordiae, he hath no other shift to unite these opinions, but by uniting those far-distant Mountains together. To effect which, he hath found no other invention, than to charge those men with error, which have carefully over-seen, Printed, and Published Ptol. lib. 5. Asia 3. Ptolemies Geography, in which they are altogether dislevered. For that last Edition of Morators sets these Hills five degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we look into those more ancient Copies of Villanovanus, and others, we shall find nothing in them to help Annius withall: for in those the Mountains Cassii stand seven degrees to the East of the Gordiae, which makes 420. miles. And for those Authors by whose authority Annius strengtheneth himself, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giveth this judgment upon them in the like dispute. Aberrarunt vero omnes, non negligentia, sed regnorum sitis ignorantia; They have all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdoms. But for an induction, to prove that the Ark of Noah stood on the Mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of

of the Scythians: and to prove the same he citeth Marcus Porcius Cato, who avoweth that 250. years before Ninus, the Earth was overflown with Waters, Et in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; And that in Scythia the flock of mortal men was renewed. The same Author also teacheth, that the Umbri before remembred (who were so called, because favored from Deucalions Flood) were the Sons of the Gallia Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse Janum cum Dyrim, & Gallis progenitoribus Umlorum; From these Scythians, he saith, that Janus came with Dyrim, and with the Gallite progenitors of the Umbri: And again, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythia tribuitur; Certainly, the prime Antiquity of Offspring is always given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia Asiatice, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia under Tribute till Ninus Time. Also Pliny called the Umbri which long since inhabited Italy, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now, that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephews of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the Mountains, on which the Ark rested; and confessing that this great Ship was grounded in Armenia, he saigneth a Nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the Mountain Ararat, near the River of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great Flood 250. years before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga; as, In Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga, mankind was restored: he therefore in the Preamble of his Commentary upon Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia salvatos. For Scythia Saga, or Sace, is undoubtedly under the Mountains of Parapimius; on which, or near which it is most probable that the Ark first took ground: and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now, the best authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name & Scythia Regem from Scythia their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather (indeed) his faithfulness in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Authour, beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulatur Scythia, The Scythians Fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that work, giveth this Title to that very Chapter; Scythiarum origo & successus fabula: The original and success of the Scythians a Fable. And (indeed) there needs no great disproof hereof, since Ptolemy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Sace, and lets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Sace; which Pliny confirms: for in respect that these Sace (saith Pliny) are the Scythians next to the Persians, therefore they gave all the rest that name. Now, that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man believeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lieth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Sace; and the Countrey about Araxes Ptolemy calleth Colchene, and Sodocene, and Sacapene, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are, or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus, or without, to the number of 100. several Nations, are by Ptolemy precisely set down.

But, to come to those latter Authours, wherof some have written, others have been a great part of those North-East Regions, and searched their Antiquities with great diligence: First, Marinus Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountains, is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Cassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatice: ab Oriente Imao Monte: à Septentrione terra cognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ostia Oxæ annis in Hyrcanum mare excurrentis: à parte ipsius maris hinc usq. ad Rhæ fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus, is that part of the World which in their own speech is at this time called Cassaria; and the same is bounded on the West-side by Sarmatia Asiatice, (or of Asia) on the East, by the Imaean Mountains: on the North, by unknown Lands: on the South, by the Saccæ (which are the Saccæ) the Sogdians, and the Margians, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as far as the mouth of Rhæ.

Now, if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatice to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (quæ magna sanè Regio est, & græ immensas nationes complectitur, which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable nations, saith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make make it more plain, he dilevereth Sarmatia it self from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nation; neither doth his fellow Frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian born of the blood of those Kings (though afterwards a Monk) ever acknowledg himself for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: though he writ that story at large, gathered by Nicolaus Salcuni, and (by the commandment of Pope Clement the fifth) in the year 1307. published.

Neither doth Matthias a Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian born, and that travelled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatice, find Armenia any way within the compass of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Travails are extant) hath observed so much of those Regions as he hath don: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he burieth that antient and received opinion, That out of the Mountains, Rhiphei, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga, or Edel; proving by unanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountains, in revum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountains of those famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Moscovia known to every Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, woody, and marish grounds. The River of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the City Tulla, some twenty English miles, out of a Lake called Ivanowefera, in the great Wood Okeznikites or Jepiphanolites. Volga, which Ptolemy calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronon, in the great Wood Vodkenskzi: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Borysbhenes (now Neper) and Djuna or Dvionda.

And this learned Polonian doth in this sort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Moscovians, and those adjoining, bounded on the West by the River of Vissa, the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a River which parts Germania and Sarmatia; and for the East-border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Asiatice he cutteth from Europe by the same River of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolemy calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus. And the same Matthias Michon further affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annus would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatice Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatice it self above three hundred and a few odd years before his own time: these be his words: Constat eam esse gentem novam, & adventitiam à partibus Orientis (quidam scilicet) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entered into Asia, & gat new seats a little more then 300. years since: For (indeed) before that time the Guths or Pauluci inhabited Sarmatia Asiatice. And this his Discourse of Sarmatia was Printed at Augusta in the year 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East for in the East it was, that the Ark of Noah rested, and the Scythæ Sacre were those people which lived at the North foot of those Mountains, of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mix themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony then the general description of Ptolemy, Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolemy, it is plain, that between all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariceæ) between Jaxartus and Jactus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariceæ, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

||. VIII.

The fifth Argument: The Vine must grow naturally near the place where the Ark rested.

TO this if we add the consideration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Raysin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Ark was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italy and France, it is brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a far colder Country. For Pyrrhus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such times as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italy, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remained between the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, neer unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they drunk Wine, which was first brought them out of Italy; and after they tasted thereof, they hasted to inhabit that Country, which brought forth such pleasant Fruit: so as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not natural in France, but from Italy brought thither; as by Saturn from thence-where into Italy.

Now it is manifest, that Noah travailed not far to seek out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsel how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to plant a Vine-yard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiving to God; and whereforever the Arke rested, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear, that he travailed far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husband-man, and not a wanderer.

An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

And that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appear, saying that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of *Sybil*a (as they be converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem edificarunt altissimam, quasi per eam Cælum essent ascensuri: Certain of them built a most high Tower, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the Heavens.

An answer to the objection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

But before I conclude this part, it is necessary to see and consider what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Ark of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountains of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Ark rested on (or upon) the Mountains of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the Marginal Note of the Geneva; the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardus; of which the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epphanim. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keep the same word) is taken to be a Mountain of Armenia; because Armenia it self had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Ark first late thereon.

But these suppositions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountains of equal stature to many other Mountains of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Ark found the highest Mountain of all other to rest on: for the Plains were also uncovered before Noah came out of the Ark. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the Books of the *Sybil*s it is written, that the Mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the Ark stayed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and feat of these Mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia and not Armenia; they are placed where the City of Celene was afterward built. Likewise in the same description the maketh mention of Marfjar, a River which runneth through part of Phrygia and afterward joyneth it self with the River Meander, which is far from the Gordiean Mountain in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Josephus (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Josephus sets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withal, that in the Province of Ceron (by others *Kair*os and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters have from thence no descent, nor issue out) the people vaunt that they had in those days reserved some pieces of Noahs Ark. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia; for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Province of Affria: so that all Media and a part of Affria is between Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountains Gordie was first borrowed out of Berosus by Josephus; yet the Text which Josephus citeth out of Berosus differs far from the words of that

Berosus

Berosus, which wandereth up and down in these days, set out by Annian. For Berosus, cited by Josephus, hath these words: Fertur & navis hujus pars in Armenia apud montem Cordiearum superesse; & quoddam Bitumen inde abasum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci hujus homines uti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordiean Mountains; and that divers do scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in stead of an amulet. But Annian his Edition of the Fragment of Berosus useth these words: Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordie montis vertice quievit, cujus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordiean Mountains, of which it is reported that some parts remain, and that men do carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of words) the name is diversly written. The ancient Berosus writes Cordias with a (C); and the Fragment Gordie with a (G); the one that the Bitumen is used for asperervative against Poyson or Incantment; the other, in Sacrifice. And if it be said that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither from any certain knowledge, nor from any approved Author: for one of them, useth the word (feritur) the other (dicitur); the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is said; and both, but by hear-say, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wife men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, these Mountains which Ptolemy calls Gordie, are not those Mountains which himself giveth to Armenia; but he calleth the Mountains of Armenia, Molchici. These be his own words: Montes Armenia nominantur ii, qui Molchici appellantur, qui preterduntur usque ad superjacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & Mons qui Paryades dicitur: The Mountains of Armenia are they which are called Molchici, stretched along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians; also the Hill which is called Paryades: which ly to the North of Gordie or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a half; and the Gordiean Mountains in 39. and a halfe: from the Northmost, of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians; and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, do still remain Christian. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountains of Gordie, otherwise Baris, Kardus or Lubar (which Ptolemy calleth Torgodiaion) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

§. XI.

Of Caucasus, and divers far higher hills than the Armenian.

For the best Cosmographers, with other, that have seen the Mountains of Armenia find them far inferiour, and under-set to divers other Mountains even in that part of the World, and else where: as the Mountain Atlas between Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolemy calls Olympus, now called Lacas, (saith Castaldus) is far surmounting any Mountain that ever hath been in Armenia: for it stretcheth three hundred furlongs, which is seven and thirty miles and upwards; of which Plutarch, Arbos adumbrat latera. Lemnia brevis: Arbos broadweth the Cap of Lemnos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that height, as neither the Winds, Clouds, or Rain overtop it. Again, the Mountain of Antandrus in Assia, not far from Ida, whence the River Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a far more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be seen from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania near the Sea, the famous Mountains of Atlas, of which Hierodotus: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non possint: Upon this Coast there is a Mountain called Atlas, whose height is said to be such, as the eye of no mortal man can discern the top thereof. And if we may believe Aristotle, then are all these inferiour to Caucasus, which he maketh the most notorious both for breadth and height: Caucasus Mons, omnium maximus, qui astrum ad ortum sunt acuminem atq; latitudine, cujus iuga a Sole radiantur usq; ad continctum ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu. Caucasus (saith Aristotle) is the greatest Mountain both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightened by the Sun-beams (usq; ad continctum) which is, saith Macrobinus, between the first crowing after mid-night and the break of day. Others affirm, that the top of this Mountain holds the Sun-beams when it is dark in the Valley; but I cannot believe either, for the highest Mountain of the World known, is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000 Leagues together: but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enjoy the Sun's company at any any

any such late hours. Besides these Mountains which Aristotle calleth Caucasi, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountain, which himself calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which funder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifest) yieldeth it self to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabzunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

||. XII.

Of divers incongruities if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

So as it doth first appear, that there is no certainty what Mountain Ararat was for: the Books of the Sybilis set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authority; those men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition have equal credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Ark should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (saith Hierom) significeth high Towers; and so may all high Hills be called indifferently: and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authors themselves do not agree in what Region the Mountains Gordis stand: for Ptolemy distinguisheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordis, and calleth those of Armenia, Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated near the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side, Araxis: and the Mountains Moschici are those Hills which disjoyn Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

||. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvel that the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

Lastly, we must blow up this Mountain Ararat it self, or else we must dig it down, and carry it out of Armenia, or find it elsewhere, and in a warmer Country, and (withal) set it East from Shinar; or else we shall wound the Truth it self with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among those Mountains which divide Italy from France, is called the Alps: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrenaeus. But as these, being continuations of many Hills, keep one name in divers Countries, so all that long Ledge of Mountains, which Pliny calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolemy both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, until they encounter and cross the Mountains of the great Imanus, are of one general name, and are called the Mountains of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seem to arise. So all these Mountains of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Cassii, Moschici, Amazonici, Heniocchi, Scythici, (thus diversly called by Pliny and others) Ptolemy calls by one name Caucasus, lying between the Seas Caspian and Euxinus: as all those Mountains which cut asunder America, even from the new Kingdom of Cyanadot, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountains of Ararat run East and West, so do those marvellous Mountains of Imanus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neer, are called by the name of Imanus, even as Pliny called these former Hills Taurus, and Moses the Hills of Ararat. The reason of several names given by Ptolemy, was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdoms, which these great Mountains bound and sever; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Affyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Arabia, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Parapanisus: having all these Kingdoms, either on the North or South side of them. For all the Mountains of Asia (both the less and the greater) have three general names; (to wit) Taurus, Imanus, and Caucasus: and they receive other titles, as they sever and divide particular Places and Regions. For these Mountains which funder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the less, on the North-side, are called Taurus; and those

Mountain

Mountains which part it from Comisena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the Mountains called Taurus, running East and West, as Imanus doth North and South. Through Taurus, the River of Euphrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Amanus to the Mountains on her West-bank, and on her East-side the Mountains are sometimes known by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolemy's three Tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the River of Tygris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they separate Affyria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but run through the Eastern Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southern part whereof the River of Bagradas riseth, which divideth the ancient Persian from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the Mountains of Sariphi, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yielding her self to Oxus (now Abia:) and drawing now near their ways end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Parapanisus; and lastly, of Caucasus, even where the famous River of Indus, with his principal companions, Hydaspis and Zaredrus, spring forth and take beginning. And here do these Mountains build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hills called Imanus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountains in this place only are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolemy) that is, between Parapanisus and Imanus; and improperly, between the two Seas of Caspian and Pontus.

||. XIV.

Of the best Wine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountain Caucasi, and toward the East-Indies: and of other excellencies of the soil.

Now, in this part of the World it is, where the Mountain and River Jamus, and the Mountain Nysus, (so called of Ezechus Nysus, or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountains of that part of the World did Coropius Becanus conceive that the Ark of Noah grounded after the Flood; of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indo-Scythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth, that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34, 35, and 36. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana: and under these Mountains Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the Land, by Moses direction, found bunches of equal bigness at Eseol.

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana, near the Mountains of Meros, did Alexander feast himself and his Army ten days together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

||. XV.

The Conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

And therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountains do also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it self sometime is known by the name of Ararat. But, as Pliny giveth to this Ledge of high Hills, even from Cilicia to Parapanisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germany are called the Alps: and all between France and Spain the Pyrenaeus; and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000 miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gave them; the diversity of appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions, and divers Countries. For in the like case do we call the Sea, which entrench by Gibraltar, the Mediterranean sea; and in-land Sea, and yet where it walseth the Coasts of Carthage, and over against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: between Italy and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Dmazzo, Adriaticum: between Athens and Asia, Egeum: between Sesius and Abydus, dux, Hellepont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosporus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Denealedonycum: and on this side, the Brittain Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this Question, we must appeal to that Judge which cannot erre, even to the Word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the words bear literally, because they are used to the very same plain purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plain (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be wary, how we fancie to our selves any new or strange exposition; And (withall) to resolve our selves, that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Book. And therefore we must respect and reverence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as Saint Augustine hath taught us, touching the Gospel of Christ Jesus (which is) Negatis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Discipulis Christi) in Evangelio legerit, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, confecerit; That no man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the Gospel (the Disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own body, setting it down.

Gen. 11. 2. The words then of Moses, which end this Dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a plain in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: which proveth without controversy, that Nimrod, and all with him, came from the East into Shinar; and therefore the Ark of Noah rested and took land to the East-ward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places wheresoever Moses maketh a difference of Countreys, he always precisely nameth toward what quarter of the World the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Jedon, he nameth Sephar, a Mountain in the East: where he remembreth Catus departure from the presence of God, he addeth; And Cain dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham, after he departed from Sechem, he useth these words; Gen. 10. 30. Afterward removing thence unto a Mountain East-ward from Bethel, he pitched his Tent: Gen. 12. 8. having Bethel on the West-side, and Haz on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter, it is written; And Abraham went forth journeying towards the South: also when Ezekiel prophesieth of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togorma were of the North-quarters: and of the Queen of Saba it is written, that she came from the South to visit Solomon: And the Magi, (or Wise-men) came out of the East to offer presents unto Christ. And that all Regions, and these travels were precisely set down upon the points of the Compass and Quarters of the World, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Judea; Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Celocryians, the Tubalines, and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the East, nor so near unto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it itself; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred to celo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in forty three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in forty five; and those Gordisean Mountains, whereon it was supposed that the Ark rested, stand in forty one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinar are situated in thirty five; and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference between East and West) the Gordisean Mountains stand in 75. degrees, and the Valley of Shinar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinar North-west, 95. degrees from the East; and if Armenia had been but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compass. But Gregory, and Hierome warn us, In scripturis ne minima differentia occurrat debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabae, apices, & puncta in divina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus: In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in divine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not believe Writers (of little authority) who also speak by hear-say, and by report, Ursertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinar lieth West from the place where the Ark of Noah rested, after the Flood; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first civil, which which had Noah himself for an instructor: and directly East from Shinar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest Grapes, and the best Wine. The great Armies also which overtopped in number those Millions of Semiramis, prove, that those parts were first Planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my self I build on his words, who in plain terms hath told us, That the Sons of Noah came out of the East into Shinar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Ark rest on those Eastern Mountains, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountains of Ararat, and not on those Mountains of the North-west, as Berosus first feigned, whom most part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warm East where Noah rested, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and lived thereon. *Placuit vero Noacho agricultura studium, in qua tractanda esse omnium peritissimum esse dicitur: ob eamque rem sua istius lingua Illi Adamath (hoc of) telluris vir appellatur celebratusque est. The study of Husbandry pleased Noah. (Such the excellency of husbandry) in the excellent learned man Arias Montanus in the knowledge and order of which it is said that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language; a man excoriated in the earth. Which also sheweth, that he was no wanderer; and that he troubled not himself with the contentions beginning again in the World, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the World where he was first delivered out of the Prison of the Ark, whereto God had committed him, to preserve him and mankind.*

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Flood; and of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

S. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder then Japhet.

OF these Sons of Noah, Which was the eldest, there is a question made. St. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are divers. But this we find every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in years, but in virtue; as by the examples of Heinoch, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controversy; The Latine Translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these words: Unto Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and elder brother of Japhet, were children born. But Junius, agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: To Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and brother of Japhet the eldest Son, were children born: So the translation of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar Translation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by these Translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in blood, but to the eldest in piety, yet the arguments are stronger for Japhet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any man of judgment should make valuation of conjectural arguments, or trife opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundredth year of his life, begat the first of his three Sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the six hundredth year (to wit) the hundredth year following, came the general Flood; two years after which, Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the year 602. of Noah's life, and in the year of Shem's life one hundred: so as Shem was but an hundred years old, two years after the Flood: and Noah begat his first born being 500. years old; and therefore were Shem the elder, he had then been an hundred years old at the Flood, and in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, and not two years after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remem- Gen. 9. 24. bred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him (to wit) Ham, of necessity the first place doth belong to Japhet. This younger son, so converted by the Vulgar and Geneva, Junius us turns it filius minimus, His youngest son; but St. Chrysostom takes it otherwise, and finds Cham to be the middle or second brother, and Japhet the youngest son of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakedness he derided) was disinherited, and lost the pre-eminence of his birth, as Esau and Ruben did. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but avoweth withal, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himself was always named in the first place; yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet, in the second Verse Moses leaveth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Japhet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weighty respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophet, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this conversion, Shem Frater Japhet major; or with the Septuagint, Junius and Tremellius, Shem Frater Japhet majoris; or with Pererius, Shem Frater Japhet ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the Reader judge. But for ought that I have seen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifyeth the strength of the former argument, That Shem's age at the time of the Flood did not agree with the elderhip (with a supposition that the Scriptures took no account of smaller numbers) I do not find in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the flood; and again in the 12. Verse: So Shela lived after he begat Ebar, four hundred and three years, &c. so as the number of two years, of three years, of five years, and afterward of two years, were always precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yield to Moses: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that known Great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

But let us go unto the Worlds plantation after the Flood, which being rightly understood, we shall find that many Nations have supposed or feigned themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which never saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the Scriptures how the sons and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, that they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so far as the story of Nations is therein handled, we must know, that both the truth and antiquity of the Books of God find no companions equal, either in age or authority. All record, memory, and testimony of antiquity whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath been borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all careful observers of time have noted: among which, thus writeth Engenius in the Proem of his Chronology: Moses is found more ancient than all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as Homer, Hesiod, and the Trojan War; and far before Hercules, Musæus, Linus, Chiron, Orpheus, Castor, Pollux, Æsculapius, Bacchus, Mercurius, and Apollo, and the rest of the Gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of Jupiter, whom the Greeks have seated in the top and highest Turret of their Divinity.

For of the three Jupiters remembered by Cicero, the antientest was the son of Æther Cicero De Nat. Dæi lib. 1. whose three sons begotten on Proserpina, were born at Athenæ, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt: Eduxit Moses populum Dei ex Egypto novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensis Regis; Moses brought the children of Israel out of Egypt in the last days of Cecrops King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of that City it self, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diversely proved, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut slender the purpose in hand, by alleging many authorities in a needless question, but leave it to the proper place.

First, we are to consider, that the World after the Flood was not planted by imagination, neither had the Children of Noah wings to fly from Shinar to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa, and Asia, in haste, but that these Children were directed by a wife Father, who knew those parts of the World before the Flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as discoverers, or at all adventure, but assigned and allotted to every Son and their issues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authours, who have no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Æneas) or else to glorify their own nations; Let us build herein upon the Scriptures themselves, and after them, upon Reason and Nature. First therefore we must call to mind, and consider, what manner of face the Earth every where had in the 130. year after the great Inundation, and by comparing those fruitfulest Valleys with our own barren and cold ground, inform our selves thereby, what wonderful Defects, what impassable fatnels of woods, reeds, briars, and rotten grals; what lakes and standing pools, and what marishes, fens, & bogs, all the face of the Earth (excepting the Mountains) was pestered withall. For, if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depresseth all vegetative and growing Nature, for one half of the year in effect) yet in twenty or thirty years, these our grounds would all over-grow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods, or with other offensive thicket, and bushes: much more did all sorts of plants, reeds, and trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Valleys; and in the Climate of a long and warm Summer, and having withall, the start of 130. years to raise themselves without controlment.

This being considered, it will appear, that all these people which came into Shinar, and over whom Nimrod, either by order or strength, took the Dominion, did, after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty People, disperse themselves into the Regions adjoining to the best part of Shinar, which contained the said Valley of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldæa; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated, some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to them many Regions, both East and West from Shinar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first possessed; yet could he not enjoy the Lot of his Inheritance on the sudden, but by time and degrees. For we find that Abraham, the true successor of Shem, dwelt in Chaldæa, at Uz; and from thence (called by God) he rested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he travelled to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had palled between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seven Chalcens, before Abraham moved out of Chaldæa; where, and in Babylonia, all those people, by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many years, and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Nineveh. Indeed, the great Masters of Nations (as far as we can know) were in that Age in the issues of Ham; the blessing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking less effect, until divers years were consumed; and until the time arrived, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chas, Atiracim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdoms of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in Japhets Portion: of Berosus his too speedy seating Gomer the Son of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhets Sons, Tubal in Spain: and of the Antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

To begin therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the Sons of Japheth, among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were divided: which division, as well to Japhets Sons, as to the rest which came into Shinar, was (if the division were made at Phaleg birth) in the year of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the years after the Flood one hundred and one; of which question else-where.

The habitations proper to the Sons of Japhet were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe, with all the Isles adjoining, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Island, both in respect that the Sea Hellspont and Ægeum, Bosphorus and the Sea Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia as also because Europe it self is (in effect) surrounded with water, laying that it is fastened to Asia by the North; for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterrane to the South and South-west, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North, North-east, and North-west. First,

First, we are to consider, that the World after the Flood was not planted by imagination, neither had the Children of Noah wings to fly from Shinar to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa, and Asia, in haste, but that these Children were directed by a wife Father, who knew those parts of the World before the Flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as discoverers, or at all adventure, but assigned and allotted to every Son and their issues, their proper parts. S. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in Japhets Portion: of Berolus his too speedy sailing Gomer the son of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhets Sons, Tubal in Spain: and of the Antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

To begin therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the Sons of Japheth, among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were divided: which division, as well to Japhets Sons, as to the rest which came into Shinar, was (if the division were made at Phaleg's birth) in the year of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the years after the Flood one hundred and one; of which question else-where.

The habitations proper to the Sons of Japhet were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe, with all the Isles adjoining; and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Island, both in respect that the Sea Hellespont and Ægeum, Bosphorus and Bosporus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia; as also because Europe it self is surrounded with water, having that it is fastened to Asia by the North; for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterranean to the South and South-west, the Ocean to the West, and British, Germane, and Baltic Sea, with that of Glaciale, to the North, North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades, or Isles lying between Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Isles of Rhoder, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia,

This partition and portion of Japheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilatet Deus Japheth; Let God spread abroad (or increase) the Posterity of Japheth, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Junius here useth the word alliciat, and not dilatet: and the Geneva, persuadeat; yet the Septuagint have dilatet, or amplificet; and such was the blessing given to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posterity of Japheth: noting not only an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Japheths Sons, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berossus and Annins, whose authority the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods Reign, depart from Babylonia, & planted Italy; which also Fundinus confirmeth in these words, *Anno decimo Nimrodii, &c. In the tenth year of Nimrods Reign, Gomerus Gallus planted a Colony in that Land afterward called Italy: and in the twelfth year of the same Nimrods Reign, Tubal seated himself in Aulstria in Spain (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. years after the Flood, according to Berossus. But this opinion is very ridiculous: For before the confusion of Tongues, the Children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore consider with reason, what time the building of such a City and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready means to perform such a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Fundinus himself out of his Author Berossus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem Montium; To the height and magnitude of the Mountains. Sure that both this City and Tower was almost builded, the Scriptures witness: but the Lord came down to see the City and Tower which the Sons of men had builded. Let us then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Brick to such a Work of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was, For where the universal Flood covered the highest Mountains fifteen Cubits, Let us build us a City and Tower (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach unto the Heavens: meaning, that they would raise their work above fifteen Cubits higher than* the highest Mountain, otherwise they could not allure themselves from the fear of a second Inundation a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the work. They also began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly over-bearing and overflowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest; approved also by the Prophet Jeremie, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantial foundation for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which Glycas upon Genesis giveth forty years. For it seemeth that the Tower was near finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward written; So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth, and they left to build the City. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the work of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the City adjoining, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time, as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Tower was thrown down) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now, to think that this work, in the newness of the World, (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten years; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same year, could creep through 3000. miles of Defart, with Women, Children, and Cattel: Let those light believers, that neither tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approve it, for I do not. And if the Ark of Noah was 100. years in building, or but near such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. years; it were more than foolishness, and madness it self, to think that such a work as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. years, and whereof they had spent some part in travelling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands, in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Work 400. years (or best but half that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished, in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials and carriages; This Work of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those those few years remembered. And for conclusion, let all men of judgment weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wives, and Children, and Cattel, to travel 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Defarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a work of 100. years than of 100. days. For in the West Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in those places where they found neither path nor guide, they have not entered the Country ten miles in ten years. And if Nimrods people spent many years by the account before remembered in passing from the East India, or the higher part thereof; which standeth in 115. degrees of Longitude, until they came into Shinaar, which lieth in 79. degrees (the distance between those places containing 36. degrees, which makes 720. leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keep the Mountains and hard ground; then the difference between Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the body of Biscay lyeth in ten degrees, and Babylon, or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Aulstria, or Biscay, is 69. degrees, which make 1380. leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers years to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Ark rested in Armenia) little above 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many years to Gomer and Tubal to travel 3000. miles, to Countries less known unto them by far, than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was known to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembered; but what he understood of most part of the world else, is unknown. And therefore did Annins ill advise himself to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spain, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrods Reign: shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be born at once? But it may be objected, that the Sons of Japheth might come by Sea, and so save this great travel through Defarts by Land. But we never read of any Navigation in those days, nor long after. Surely, he that knoweth what it is to imbarque so great a People, as we may time, will not easily believe that there were any Vessels in those days to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattel, by whose milk they lived, and fed their children: For milk and fruit were the banqueting dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Herds and numbers of their Cattel: who had Flocks of Sheep, and great Drovers and Herds of their own, and their own Shepherds and Herdmen. Now, if Tubal had pait by Sea from any part of Palestine, Syria, or Silicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have overgone Granada, Valentia, and other Provinces in that Traict; pait the Streights of Gibraltar; disdained all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countreys; and have fought out the Iron, Woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argonauts, there were scarce any Vessels that durst cross the Seas in that part of the World: and yet that which Jason had (if the tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poor one (God knows) and perchance, such as they use this day in Ireland: which although it carried but four and fifty passengers, yet it was far greater than any of the former times: Erat enim antea parvarum navicularum usus: For in former times they used very small vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gave themselves of old to far-off Navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the invention of Ships to them:

Prima ratem ventis credere docti Tyros.
Tyris knew first how Ships might use the Wind.

And for those Boats called Longe naues, or Gallies, Pliny saith, that Agesias ascribed the device to Ptolemy: and Philostephanus to Jason: Ctesias to Samyras; and Sapphanis, to Semiramis: Archimachus, to Ageon: to which invention the Erythraei are said to have added certain numbers of Oars; and then Amimoles the Corinthian to have increased them the Carthaginians afterwards to have brought them to four Banks: the Quinghe Remi first to have been used by Nestor the Salaminian, with which Vessels, in those parts of the World, the Romans served themselves in the Punic War. But these be, perhaps, the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are as constantly cast the devising of these Gallies on the Sessirris, though semiramis used them in the passage of her Army over Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first to carry a Ship into Greece; and yet the Samothracians challenge the invention: and yet Terullian (on the contrary) gives it to Atinerus: others, to Neptune; Thucydides, to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians used to coast the shores of the Red-Sea upon rasses, deviled by King Erythrus: and in the time of the the Romans, the Britains had a kind of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of small twigs, and covered over with leather: of which kind I have seen at the Dingle in Ireland, and else-where. Naves ex corio circumfusa in Oceano Britannico (saith Textor): of which Lucan the Poet:

And although it cannot be denied, when Noah, by Gods inspiration, was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Ark, that then many things concerning Navigation were first revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference between the Ark of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume upon any long voyages to Sea, at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattel; as also common reason can tell us, that even now, when this Art is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appear, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or use of Ships, fit for any long navigation. For, if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would not have been dead for so many hundred years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who have cast Nations into Countreys far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is joyned both Nature, Reason, Policy, and Necessity: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibility.

S. IV.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Melchec, feared first about Asia the Left; out of Ezechiel, Chap. 38. 39.

Now, although many learned and reverend men have formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath been and is received; yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus, was also in some things much mistaken: and for Josephus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors withall; so was he in the Plantation of the World very bold and fabulous; whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his testimonies for currant, have been by him far mis-led. But the better to conceive what Regions of the World Gomer the Son of Japheth posselt, as also Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names have troubled many Commentators, saith Math. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find most judicious in the examination of this Plantation. He takes authority from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapters directeth us, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince, or chief Conductor, in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Japheth himself posselt, all Asia the Left was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Japheth (whom Ezechiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appear, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependency upon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter Ezechiel prophesieth of the uniting of the two Kingdoms of Israel and Juda, after their delivery from Captivity.

By which Prophecie of Ezechiel it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written: And David my Servant shall be King over them, and they shall have one Shepherd, (that is) they shall be united as they were in David's time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seek to impeach this Union, and disturb the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receive to grace, and promised to restore. And loin the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infected the Israelites after their return, and fought to subvert them; all which were the Subjects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cassogians, next bordering ing Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the left, which lay North from Judea. The words of Ezechiel are these: Son of man, set thy face against Gog, and against the Land of Magog, the chief Princes of Melchec (or Moloch) and Tubal: and afterward; Behold, I come against the chief Prince of Melchec and Tubal: and in the sixth Verse; Gomer and all his Bands, and the Hosts of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel having first delivered the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were that should in vanity assay Israel. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how seated and joyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith Saint Hierom) redum or covering of a house: and Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith he) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devil, under humane form. He addeth, that Magog is as much to layas Gog: the Letter (M) being an Hebrew Proposition, and importeth as much as off or from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So far Pintus at least in this note amils; that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person; but for a Nation: with which agreeeth this observation of Beroaldus, Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region, or Nation: for the Letter (He) which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrews call Holiajedia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Melchec (or Moloch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29. Chapter is made manifest: Behold, I come against thee Gog the chief Prince of Melchec and Tubal. This must needs be meant by the Successors of Selencus Nicator, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seek to make the Jews their Tributaries only, but endeavour by all means, and by all kind of violence, to extinguish the Religion itself (which the Hebrews profess'd) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortal and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name; and dead Images. S. Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths; belike, because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places: and cities thereabout Hermolans Barbarus out of Pompeii derives the Turks from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others, of a Region: others, for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Justin; who says that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greeks Stories call Egyes: who in former time having slain Candaules the Lydian, gave his own name to that Nation, thence after called Egyades; and thereof also the Egyean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia (of which Egyes was King) forth Futlons from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Egyennus fluvium; Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Rivers of Hyllus and Mander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Egyes King of Lydia: who, as he had subdued the Country about the River Rhodius, which runneth into the Hellespont, called the Promontory Trapez after his own name Egyes. These Opinions do also seem to strengthen that of Justin. For Magog, which he is that part of Asia the left, which Hulaster obtained; and after him his Son Cresus, who (as Justin further notes) having mastered all those Regions as far South as Thimus in the Border built the City Gigara, or Gogarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the City of Gog) seated in Cassogria, whose People were the ancient Enemies of the Jews.

Now, that Magog is found in Cassogria, Pliny affirmeth, saying; Cassogria habet Bannbycen; que alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur; Syria vult Magog; Cassogria habet in Bannbyce; which in another name is called Hierapolis; but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us, that the monstrous Idol Magog, called by the Greeks Derceto, was here worshipped; Lucian makes mention hereof, saying; That the City had anciently another name, which he yet expresseth not; forbearing, perhaps, the word Magog, as sounding nothing elegantly in the Greek. But if we may believe Strabo, then was Edeffa in Magopania, the same Bannbyce or Hierapolis; where the same Idol was worshipped. Orientalis is doubtful whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bannbyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough be, that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certain it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subject unto the Kings of the Race of Selencus. Now, I do not condemn the Opinion of Hermolans Barbarus following Josephus, but grant that, perhaps, Magog might also be the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made Prince of Magog the Nations of Cassogria, and the North parts adjoining be meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might be propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denied, that the Scythians in old times coming out of the North-east, wasted the better part of Asia the less, and posselt Caloglyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plain: for this Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Judea, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North-quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infected the Israelites were, the Ptolemies, Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successors of Sелеucus, the Successors of Alexander Macedon. Calliclinus Tyrus thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Story of Tobias. Pliny takes it not only to have been called Bambyce, as we have said, but also Edessa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name: now, the known name is Aleppo: for Belonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This City had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred City, (for so the word Hierapolis signifies) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idol of the Mermaid Atergates, or Atergite, according to Pliny, which the Greeks call Derpote.

If then we confer the words of Ezechiel in the third Verse of the thirty eight Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Meshech and Tubal; and withal remember that Hierapolis was the City of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Judea: with whom also Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceive) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog, (which were Northern Nations in respect of Judea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Caloglyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Josephus, and whosoever else hath followed them therein, are to be rejected. But if Josephus refer himself to latter times, and think that some Colonies of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia pass into Spain (to wit) from that piece of Land between Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania, (most part possessed by the Georgians) then is his judgment of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of opinions, it may be granted, that in process of time these people might from their first habitation, pass into the Countries near the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spain.

Josephus makes mention of the Iberis, saying, that they were antiently called Thobelors, as of Tubal; from whence (saith Justine) they passed into Spain to search out the mines of that Region: having belike understood that it was a Southerly Country, and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chabyles, lived altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonauts did visit them:

*Hæc gens sellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Merebas hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant.*

The Chabyles plough not their barren soil,
But undermine high Hills for Iron Veins:
Changing the Office of their endless toil
For Merchandize, which their poor lives sustains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to return thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old; who were easily drawn to pass over the Straights into that Country; and after by the Moors, who held Granado, and the South parts, eight hundred years, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth year of Nimrod's Reign, Tubal pass into Spain; and therein built Saint Uval: a poor Town, and a poor device, God knows. Certain it is: that we must find Meshech or Meshech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarmæ not far off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince, of Meshech and Tubal; and maketh Gomer and Togarmæ their assistants. And that Meshech inhabited Asia. Fundanus (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his words: *Mesacus, qui à Mose Mesech, prison Mesor: ab Abule monte usque ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio posita Cappadocia dicta est, in qua vbi Mexica, &c. hæc est terra: Magog: principatus: Mesacus, vbi: Moses cœleth Mesech; placed ibi antient Mesians from the Adiant: Adiant, unto the Coast of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Town Mexica, &c. this is the principal Country of Magog. And this doth Annus also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Meshech and Tubal; and therefore that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians: is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly West, and not North from Judea. Also Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophesieth* phecieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Meshech and Tubal jointly. And for a final proof, that these Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how far soever stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horfmen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude, and a mighty. Then, if any man believe that these troops came out of Spain over the Pyrenees, and first passed over a part of France, Italy, Hungary, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued again about the Hellefont, or else compassed all Pontus; and Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is half the length or compass of the then known World; he may be called a strong Believer, but he shall never be justified thereby. But on the contrary, it is known that Sелеucus was a Province neighbouring Palestina or Judea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) joyned unto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the less, (namely, the Seleucids) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus overthrow Antiochus the Great: after which yet they posselt Syria, till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meshech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he seated himself with Togarmæ, not far from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asia the less; and in long tract of time his valliant Issue filled all Germany, rested long in France and Brittany, and possessed the utmost borders of the Earth: accomplishing (as Melancthon well notes) the signification of their Parents name, which is Utmost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean; then did they return upon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy Restorer of our Antiquities, M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth signifie Robbers; necessity forcing them to spoil their Neighbours, to whom in their original, they were as near joynted, as afterwards in the seats which they possessed. For that the Warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Ganks, the authority of Cæsar affirming it, is proof sufficient. But in times following, they pursued richer Conquests, and more ease, though further distant, by which (to omit their other enticements not here to be spoken of) they were drawn at length into Asia the less, and occupied those parts, which had formerly been held by their Progenitors. I lay not that they claimed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their own Pedigree. Neither can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thither; unless he will think, that all those Nations which from far parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinar, may by that Argument be proved not to have issued from thence at the first.

Now, concerning Samothes, for his excellent wisdom, surnamed Dis, whom Annus maketh the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother, Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of Japheth's Sons) they must find him in some old Poet: For Fundanus, a great Berosian, confesseth, Quis hic Samothes fuerit incertum est; Who this Samothes was, it is uncertain; neither is there any proof that he was that same Dis, whom Cæsar saith the Ganks suppose to be their Ancestor; yet, and Vigener confesseth with Fundanus, Moys: ou ne sçait qui il estoit; No man knows who he was.

f. V.

Among the Tubalines Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

Before I go on with Noah his Sons, I think it is necessary to disprove the Fiction which Annus hath of Noah himself; an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wrested) by those Authors of whom himself hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Picior, Cato, Lavinus and others. For Annus seeks to persuade us, that Noah (surnamed Janus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italy, wherein he lived 92 years: This to disprove, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For, if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Bere, Achad, Chalne and Nineve, by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great mark to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92 years. But it were a needless labour for me to disprove the authority of that Berosus, on whom Annus groundeth, seeing so many learned men have so demonstratively proved that Fragment to be counterfeited. Besides that, Tatianus the Assyrian, in his Oration against the Greeks, avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote only three Books dedicated to Antiochus the Successor of Sелеucus I. i.

Nicanor:

Nicamor: but Annus hath devised five Books, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled onely the estate of the Chaldeans and Affyrians, Annus hath filled this Fragment with the busines of all the World. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Annus, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Enes) continued but 150. years: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Enes arrival into Italy, there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married 2000. in the Worlds year (as some reckon) 2717. after the Flood 1064. and Noah died 450. years after the Flood: and so there past between Janus of Italy, and Noah furnished Janus 704. years. For Saturnus succeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latius followed Fannus: which Latius lived at once with Tantanes the 27. King of Affyria: with Peloponnesus, with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Judge of Israell. Now, all these five Kings of the Latines having consumed but one hundred and fifty years, and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fifty years, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greeks had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they, too, the Son of Xuthus, the Son of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Tones, who were indeed the children of Javan, the fourth Son of Japheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Javan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the same: So had they Medus the Son of Medea, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were defended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third Son of Japheth.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the British Language hath remained among us above 2000. years, and the English Speech ever since the invasion of the Angles, and the same continuance have all Nations observed among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore it is strange, if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italy his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plain resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could have quite extinguished) should have been found in the Languages of those Countreys. For which reasons we doubt not but these personal Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italy, Spain, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Grecian Janus which commanded them, and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. years (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latius, the fifth King: which also Saint Augustine and Jysine confirm: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibility. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanity, I may out of themselves add thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Cauldessa), the wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome, (the Latines and Romans taking from Janus all their Idolatrous, and Heathenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to believe that Noah himself (who is said by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just man, and whom God of all mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and ungrateful, to set up or devise any Heathen, Salvage, or Idolatrous adoration, or have instituted any Ceremony, contrary to that which he knew best pleasing to God himself.

That Gomer also and his Son Togorma of the posterity of Japheth, were first seated about Asia the East: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe, and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turn now to the Sons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Flood: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessity taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countreys bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such manner; as that they might repair to each other, and keep intelligence by River; because the Land was yet Desert, and overperv with Woods, Reeds, Bogges, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chush took the South part of Chaldea down the River of Gehon, by which he might pass to and fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur, or Orchoa, near the Lakes of Chaldea, might by the same River get up to Babylon, and receive succour from thence. All which Traff of Land upon Gehon Southward, Moses, in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chush; because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chushite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for a while oppressed, preft, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made him his own Nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimrod, and son of Chush, took both Banks of Tygris, especially on the East side of the River: by which River his people might also pass to and fro to Babel.

The Imperial seat of which Region of Havilah or Susien, was antiently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Susa. Chush himself took the Banks of Gehon, and planted those Countreys Westward, and Southward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Desert, where Ptolemy placeth the City of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Seba, and Sheba, with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tygris, to convey them into the Persian gulf, which washeth the banks of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sons of Chush might take Land down the River as they pleased. Also the City of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the said River of Tygris, and from thence a Colony passed to Charran, standing also upon a navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japheth sons settle themselves together, and took their seats in Asia the less: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward; into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, sate down first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phoenicia: and from thence Gomer, or his children, passed on into Asia the less, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the less, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witness Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle fo intitled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gave names to divers places, as to the Mountains about Albania (called Cymmerius) and to the City of Cymmeris in Phrygia; also Porphorus Cymmerius took appellation from this Nation; in the out-let whereof was also a City of that name, called Cymmerian: which Pliny saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Town in Campania, so called of the unhealthful waters favouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus.

The children of Tubal ranged as far as Therria, to whom the Moschici were Neighbour; which others write Moscheci. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Moscheci and Tubal: For these Moschi (which Ptolemy calleth Moschi) inhabit Syrcena a Province of Armenia; directly South from the Mountains Moschici, the Valley between the Mountains Moschici, and the Mountains Pariades: out of whose North part springeth the River Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Moscheci are descended also the Moscovians (saith Melancthon); and it may be, that in process of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Moscheci (saith Melancthon) signifyeth enlargers, enlarging of stretching forth. Togorma also: first did inhabit amongst his Parents and Kindred: The Togormians were also called Giblet, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchy of Phoenicia; the same which Pliny calleth Gaben: from whence Solomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Jerusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the less Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Togormians, and their Cities Togorm; of which Cities Togorm, subdued by Lucius the Roman, built one: Herodotus hath planted the Togormians in Babylonia; forgetting the prophecy of Ezechiel against the Affyrians: They of the house of Togorm, brought to thy Faives, Moschi, and horfion, and Adler; which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Medicerran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Josephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I do not deny, but they might be, in the ensuing ages; and so might the Kibatin be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred years after the twelfth of Nimrod's reign. The Jews conceive that the Turks came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Togor. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Gymnarians. But Strabo affirms, that the Turks descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Moschicia. But for these subdivisions it were infinite to examine them. Only of the first and second Plantation, and of the first Nations after the Flood, is the matter which I labour to discover; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of less undermore quiet, or (perchance) of less understanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could could be hardly known: only reason hath taught us, that they dwelt among the rest, and were covered with the fame of others, who took on them the Conduktion and Dominion over the rest.

From Madai the third son of Japheth, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the son of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Javan the fourth son of Japheth: and of Mefech of Aram, and Mefech of Japheth.

OF Javan the fourth son of Japheth came the Tones, which were afterwards called the Greeks: and so the Latine and Greek Interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Ely: Et mittam exiis qui salvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italian, & Graciam: And I will send those that escape of me to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneva here useth the word (Tarshish) for Tarsus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigrine and the Geneva use the names Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Tones were the Athenians, though themselves dream that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancestors, and growing (as it were) out of the foile itself: who abounding in people, sent Colonies into Asia the less, of whom came the Tones of those parts. Others derive the Athenians from Ion the son of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Javan mays the fashion of that supposition, who so many years preceded Xuthus, Ion or Deucalion. Pausanias tells us that Xuthus stole out of Thebais with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciously received by Erichon, who gave him his Daughter in marriage: of whom he received two sons, Ion and Achene, the supposed Ancestors of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionica, faith Plutarch in the life of Theseus;) who, when he had joynd Megara to Attica, erected a Pillar in that Isthmos or Strait, which fastneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hec non sunt Peloponnesus, sed Ionica. These Countries are not Peloponnesus, but of Ionica: and on the other side which looketh towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionica.

Strabo out of Hecateus affirmeth that the Tones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Tones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the less, the name of Tones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themselves, yet I find this conjecture of Hecateus reasonable enough. For though it were to him unknown, yet sure I am that Asia the less had people before Greece had any: and that Javan did not flee from Babylonia into Greece, but took Asia the less in his passage; and from thence past over the nearest way, leaving his own name to some maritime Province on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himself believed, that Ion took the name from Ion the son of Xuthus; so much he had learned from themselves: which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greeks in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the less, opposite unto them, which they held for divers years. And howsoever the Greeks vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their own) deride and disprove their pride and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested between the Sythyians and the Egyptians, as Justin out of Trogus, in the Marbetween Vexors of Egypt, and Tanais of Sythia, witnesseth: which preceded far the reign of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greeks were all Salvages, without Law or Religion; living like brute Beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (faith Saint Augustine) lived together with Moses.

The sixth son of Japheth was Mefech; whom the Septuagint call Mofech (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chief Prince of Mefech and Tubal). But this we must remember, that between Mefech the son of Aram, and Mefech (or Mofech) the son of Japheth, there is little difference in name; and both by divers Interpreters diversly written. Montanus, with the Vulgar, writeth Mefech, the son of Aram; Alex; the Geneva, Mefch; Junius, Mefch. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalm, that either Mefech the son of Japheth, was the parent of those people, or gave the name to that Province wherein David hid himself: or else (which may rather seem) that it took name from Mefech the son of Aram. For David bewailing his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) useth these words: Woe is me that I remain in Mefech; and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus; Hei mihi quia peregrinor

Id. lib. 11. c. 10.

tam diu: habito tanquam Scuria Kedarum. The Septuagint gives it this sense: Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: with which this of the Latine agreeth; Hei mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwise, and in these words: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Assanis, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I have travailed among those of Asia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or which soever conversion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petraea; and the Chaldean putteth Asia in stead of Mefech, but the Hebrew it self hath Mefech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Mefech the son of Aram, 1 Chron. 17. is called Mefech, it is indifferent whether this Nation took name from Mefech or Mofech both bordering Judaea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince: for so Ezechiel makes Mefech and Tubal. But as for those that take Mefech out of the word Mofech (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muscovian: sure they presume much upon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. Sure I am that David never travelled so far North (for to him Muscovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a City on the Mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mofech the Father of the Muscovians: and herein also Melanchton runs with the tide of common opinion, and sets Mefech in Muscovia, though with some better advice of judgment; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalm, (Hei mihi quid exulo in Mefech) to signifie, Genis ejus feritatem insignem esse: That the ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fiercenes or brutality of the Muscovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the same ferity or cruelty which those Northern Muscovians had, may aswell be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarans. For this Country took name of Kedar the second son of Ismael, of whom a people of equal fiercenes to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people;) the same being foreshewed by the speech of the Angel to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wilde man: his hand shall be against every man, &c. every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desert (faith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochbe on the East, and the Cedars Southward, both which joyntly upon the Nabathae. So it appeareth (as before) that Mofech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Adagee, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did joyn to Mefech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the less, commanded by the succellors of Selencus, enemies of the re-establishment of Israel and Juda. But (as I have already said) it might well be, that long after the first Plantation the issue of Mofech (or Mofech) might pass into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and give names both to Mazagae in the one, and to the Mountains Mofchier in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly into Muscovia, and to all opinions saved. But all salvage Nations over-grown and uncultivated, do (for the most part) shew a late Plantation, even as civility, letters, and magnificent building, witness antiquity.

Tyras, the seventh son of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the sons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirm. Josephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the World Tyras peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speak of the Sons of Gomer, which were these,

Afcanez, Ripbath, and Togorma:

§. VIII.

Of Afcanez and Ripbath, the two elder Sons of Gomer.

Afcanez was the Father of those which the Greeks call Regni, (faith Josephus) but he gives no reason why.

Eusebius makes Afcanez the Father of the Goths. The Jews in their Thargum make him the root of the Germane Nation; but their explications are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Afcania in Phrygia, near the Rivers of Hilus and Cisr: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuscones were descended of the Afcanez: (for Tuscones, faith he, is as much to say, as of the Afcanez, proposito articulo die Afcanez) and that the word signifieth, a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not far from Phrygia was the Lake Afcania, known by that name in the Romans time. And among the Kings which came to the succour of Troy, was Afcianus (Deo fmilis, faith Homer) like unto God: because he was beautiful and strong: for in the same manner both Virgil grace Aneas, Os hnumerosque Deo fmilis; In face and body like one of the gods: Virgil also remembereth such a River, together with the Hills Gargara: as, Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, tranſque ſonantem Afcianum; Appetite leads them both over the mountains Gargara, and the roaring Afcianus. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillton upon the River Afcianus, which is adjoining to Aſſia; and is near the border of the Trojan Empire: and the Lake Afcanez he directs us to find by the description of Prufia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth far within the Countreys of Bitthynia: and then from Prufia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this Lake lieth, even between Prufia and Nicea. And so Junius (as I conceive him) takes them of Afcanez, and the Inhabitants of Pontus and Bitthynia, and those North parts of Aſia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Afcianus the Son of Aeneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Aſſia. Of Afcania a Lake of Bitthynia, Ptolemy witnesseth: and Strabo giveth Afcania both a Lake, a River, and a Town in Aſſia, near unto Cio; which also agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Prufia (before spoken of) near Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy, Afcanez.

Now, whether these places took name of Afcanez the Son of Gomer, or of Afcianus the Son of Aeneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Afcianus which brought succour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Aeneas Son, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it seemeth that the Countreys whence those succours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia, or Aſſia, but further off, and from the North parts of all Aſia the less, which by Hieronymus is called Afcanez, by the figure Synecdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For the Prophet Hieronymus we shall learn of what Nation the Afcanez were, whose words are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nations against her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Afcanez, against her, &c. meaning, against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the Mountains of Ararat which run through it: Adinni, the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name (faith Junius and others before him:) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phenicia, and Palestina; and therefore Meſopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the Story of Jacob and Eſau, and call it Aram-Padan. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Afcanez joyned with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoil of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Afcanez, Germany, or Almain: for we hear of no ſwart Rutiers at that siege. But the Afcanez were of those Nations which were either subject or allied to the Medes: of which if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in after-times without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Josephus, who calls them Rhegini; or of the Jews, who will have them to be Almains; when they confirm it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will think as they do.

Of Riphat, the second Son of Gomer, there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beza and Perrin think that he wandered far off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his Plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that he might seat himself with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no room or soil in those days for all the Sons and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Riphei were of Riphat, which the Greeks afterwards (according to Josephus) called the Paphlagonians: and Riphei (faith Melancthon) signifieth Giants: These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmataru gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the love of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names, and became Heneti (a custom exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thwart the Land, and peopled Myria, desirous (faith Melancthon) of a warmer soil of Fruit and Wine. These Heneti, or Veneti, whom Melancthon taketh to be one people, filled all the Land between the Baltick and Adriatick.

Adriatick Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulf Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possessed of Lithuania and Polonia, disturbed the Plantation of the Boii and Hermondurii. Therefore it seemeth to me, that of Riphat, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arius Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time, Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembered, chiefly between the Rivers of Vistula and Alba. The name (faith Melancthon) signifieth wandering, or wanderers, or Nomades: a people which lived by White-meats and Fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third Son of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Javan's children, which were four:

Elisa, Tharſis, Cethim, Dodonini.

Of the four Sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharſis, either for a proper Name, or for the Sea.

OF Elisa, or Elipha, came the Eoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greeks were called Hellenes, faith Montanus. Melancthon makes Elisa the Father of the Eoles in Aſia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greeks were descended in general of Javan, it is probable that Eoles and the Elei, took name of Elisa his eldest Son. Ezechiel in the 27. Chap. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa, Hyacinthus & purpura de insulis Elisae facta sunt opimentum tunis: Blue Silk and purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was their covering. The Chaldaean for Elisa, write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigrine, the Geneva, and Junius, keep the word Elisa: and so I think they might do with reason: For there was not found any such Purple-Dye in Italy in those days, nor since, that I can read of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better conjecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it self: and before that, among the Cyclades; and on the Coast of Genetia.

Tharſis the second Son of Javan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharſis is the Metropolis. Montanus, for Tharſis in Cilicia, understandeth Carthage in Africa; but (referring the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldaean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharſis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharſis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldaean Paraphrast translates Tharſis, Africa. But Solomon's Ships were prepared in the Red-Sea at Eſon-Gaber, in the Bay of Eſau, near unto Adrian, where Jethro (Moses Father-in-law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petrea, Idumaea, or of the Chusites; and they failed to the higher part of the East-India. For it had been a strange Navigation to have spent three years in the passage between India and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have been failed in six or ten days. And if so great riches might have been found within the bounds of the Mediterranean Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon have entertained that Trade also. But this enterprise of Solomon is in this sort written of, in the first of Kings: Alfo King Solomon made a Navie of Ships in Eſon-Gaber, which is beside Elath, and the brink of the Red-Sea, in the Land of Edom: and Hiram sent with the Navie his servants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the servants of Solomon: and they came to Ophir, and ſet from thence 420. Talents of gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the World like unto their own, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that one (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word used for the Sea in general) so, because the Israelites and the Phenicians knew no other Sea than that of the Mediterranean in the beginning; and that the people of Tharſis had the greatest Ships, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharſis used often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharſis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we use it ordinarily whereforever we navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea; or that they are set out every year, or every three years to the Sea, and therefore Tharſis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but used for the Sea it self. But in this place, Tharſis is truly taken for Tharſis, the chief City in Cilicia, founded by Tharſis the second Son of Javan, or by his Successors in memory of their first Parent: To this City arrived Alexander Macedoni, before he gave the first overthrow to Darius; and casting himself into the River to bathe and wash his body, he fell into an extreme Fever, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharſis was S. Paul born. Now, this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For Gomer and his other Sons inhabiting Aſia the less; and that part part of Syria adjoining) Javan, who was to pass over the Sea into Greece, took the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gave the Islands between Iona the less and Greece to Elisa, and left Tharbis upon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that City took name.

The third Son of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, faith Berosidus, but I allow better of Melanthion's opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural (faith he) and signifies persuaders, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Isai. 23. (according to Melanthion) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hæc calamitas ab Elai prædicta est, qui capite vicissimò tertio inquit, venturos esse everiores Tyri ex terra Citiim; This calamity (faith Melanthion) was foretold by Elai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the destroyers of Tyre were come out of Citiim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from the Continent (and so also Citiim might be taken for Italy, faith Beoraldus) yet we must take the first performance of the former Prophecie which took effect by the destruction of the Tyrans by Alexander, who, after seven Moneths siege, entred that proud City, and cut in pieces seven thousand principal Citizens; strangled two thousand, and changed the freedom of thirteen thousand others into bondage and slavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appear plainly in the first of the Macchabees, in these words: *After that Alexander the Macedonian, the son of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the Ile of Cyprus, in which (faith he) there remaineth the City Citiim, the Country of Zeno the Philosopher (witness Laertius) which City Pinnus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in S. Hieronim's time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the Islands of Cethim; and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet, because Tharbis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly over against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharbis: and finding that Island too straight for his people, after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both in Afia and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and brothers, he sent Colonies over the Ægean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.*

Dodonius the fourth Son of Javan, and the youngest brother (by the most opinions) fate down at Rhodes, as near Cethim, Tharbis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodonius and Rhodanus are used indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so alike, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebraicis affirm. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soil in Cyprus: so Dodonius (seated in a far less Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epyrus. And though the City of Dodona was not then built (or perchance not so ancient as Dodonius himself yet his posterity might give it that name in the memory of their first Parent, as it happened all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noah's children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many years after: every of their Families being desirous to retain among them, by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdoms were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their judgments) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himself and his children in the edge and frontier of Afia the less, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Joseph their Father had done in the body of the lesser Afia, together with Javan's brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest, round about him: And in like sort did Chush (the Son of Cham) people Babylonia, Cheldec, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the Sons of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia itself) travelled Southward in Arabia felix, and South-westward into Arabia petraea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adjoining to Nimrod. Moses the brother of Chush in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Hebrea adjoining. The Sons of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the Sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterranean Sea: of which I shall speak hereafter. But first of the Sons of Cham or Ham; which were four:

Chush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

S. X.

That the seat of Chush the eldest Son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scriptures, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

¶ I.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Ethiopes, Wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

THAT Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm, vers. 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the Land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, He slew all the first-born in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also found a great City in Thebaidai, called Cheramis (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder Son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now, though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chush could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will add some farther proof to the former. For, the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked contrivings, and senseless interpretations. Surely, however the Septuagint and Josephus have hereinafter failed, that Chush could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia (to wit) both that Arabia called Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desert: which Regions Chush and the Chushites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first fate down altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth the Controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. vers. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite: together with some places which speak of Nebuchodonosor's Conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place Num. 12. vers. 1. as also elsewhere, understand Chush for Ethiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself herein; and then it will appear that Josephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Josephus, presuming that Chush was Ethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. vers. 1. is called a Woman of Chush) was a Woman of the Land of Ethiopia, feigneth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers City; and to the end, to obtain Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City itself, and to deliver it into Moses hands: The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lieth thus in Josephus. And after he hath described the strength of the Ethiopian City Meroe, which he saith at length Chambyris called so from the name of his Sister (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic enim Moses residere exercitum otiosum agere ferret, hoste non audente manus conservere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Ethiopum Regis filia nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English: When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged durst not sally and come to handy-strokes, there happened this accident in the mean while: The Ethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, whom some assault given, beheld the person of Moses, and much admired his valour: And knowing that Moses had not only up-belted and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Ethiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her own affection, which daily increased, she made means so to send unto him by one of her trustiest servants, to offer her self unto him; and become his Wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession; whereupon she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

¶ II.

A Dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

THIS Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia itself to have been the Country of Adah his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Ethiopia; but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and modern, teach us, saying, that the Sabaans are Arabians; and not Ethiopians; except Josephus can can persuade us, that the Queen of Saba, which came from the South to hear the Wisdom of Solomon, were a Negro, or Black-Moor. And though Damianus & Goer speak of certain Letters to the King of Portugal from Prester John, of the Abissines: wherein that Ethiopian King would persuade the Portugals, that he was defended of the Queen of Saba, and of Solomon; yet it doth no where appear in the Scriptures, that Solomon had any Son by that great Princess: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sihac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hiernsalem, his Brother (the Son of Saba and Solomon) who joynd upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprise, as also given aid and succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his own obedience. Neither is it any thing against our Opinion of Moses his Wife, to have been an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moses married the Daughter of Jethro, Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North-coast of the Red-Sea, over against the body of Egypt, and near Elson-Gaber, where Solomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red-Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Idumaea joyneth to the Tribe of Juda by the North; to Arabia Petrea, by the East; to the Mediterranean, by the West; and to the Red-Sea, by the South-east. And if we mark the way which Moses took when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appear that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it self, he had formerly lived forty years; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Josephus confesseth, and S. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the Wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side, this Text makes much against Josephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharaoh, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the third Chapter, it is as plain as words can express, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When Moses kept the sheep of Jethro his Father-in-law, Priest of Madian, and drove the Flock to the Desert, and came to the mountain of God in Horeb. Now, that Mount Horeb is not in Ethiopia, every infant knoweth. And if we may believe Moses himself, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Josephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Country and friends) neither had she the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was she a Negro, but a Madianitish. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest Exod. means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his People first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate, and a stranger) defended the Daughters of Reuel from the other Shepherds, and drew them Water to water their Sheep: upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whose Daughter he married, and not for any betraying of Towns or Countreys.

From hence also came Jethro to Moses at Rephidim, not far from Idumaea, and finding the insupportable government of such a multitude, he advised him to distribute this weighty charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Family. And if Jethro had been an Ethiopian, it had been a far progress for him to have passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to have found Moses in the border of Idumaea: the Egyptians hating Moses, and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petrea (which joyneth to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandered forty years, and did by these late travels of his; seek to instruct the Children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished up with the milk of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathens: and finding that those stiff Plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Desarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those he might receive fruit, agreeable to his own desire, and Gods Commandments.

Lastly, this Opinion of Josephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysostomus, who also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His own words have this beginning: Mentitur citam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Moysen; &c. Apollinaris also habet, in affirming that Moyses had two Wives: and who doth not perceive those things feigned by them? for it is manifest, that the Wife of Moyses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that joyneth to Arabia: so far Chrysostomus.

|| III.

Chush ill expounded for Ethiopia, Ezechiel 29. 10.

Now, as Chush is by the Septuagint converted Ethiopia, and the Wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopia: so in the conquest of Nebuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nebuchodonosor was never in Ethiopia. Echold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Affirian) I come upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Tower of Seveneh, even to the borders of the Black-Moors: which last words should have been thus converted: From the Tower Seveneh, to the borders of the Chulites, or Arabians, between which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Seveneh to the Ethiopians, hath no fence at all, Seveneh it self being the border of Egypt, Seveneh it self being the border of Ethiopia, or the Land of the Black-Moors. So as if Nebuchodonosor conquest had been but between Seveneh and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did express no other victory than the conquest of all that Land and Country, lying between Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countries joyn together; or all the North parts of England between Barnick and Scotland: for this hath the same fence with the former, if any man fought to express by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barnick being the North border of England, as Seveneh or Syena is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida, which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nebuchodonosor never entered into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Ethiopia for Chush.

|| IV.

Another place of Ezechiel, Chap. 30. Vers. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

And as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort converted: *In die illa egredientur nunciis facie mea in tribus ad conterendam Ethiopiam confitentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Genevaans: In that day shall their messengers go forth from me in ships to make the careless Moors afraid. Now, the Latine for (ships) hath the Greek word Trieres for Triremes, which are Gallies of three* banks, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should have been (as in the former) amended by using the word Chush, or Arabia, for Ethiopia, or the Black-Moors, every man may see which meanly understandeth the Geography of the World, knowing, that to pass out of Egypt into Ethiopia, there need no Gallies or Ships, no more than to pass out of Northampton into Leicester-shire: Ethiopia being the conteminate Region with Egypt, and not divided so much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt Nebuchodonosor should send Gallies along the Coast of the Red-Sea, by which an Army might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Story (sparing the long wearisome march over all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan) which Army might thereby surprize them unawares in their security and confidence. For when Nebuchodonosor was at Seveneh within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither Gally nor Ship to pass into it; being all one large and firm Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, than one In-land shire is parted from another: and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleasure, he could not have done it; for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and steepy Mountains) called Catadupe Nilis, were at hand.

Lastly, I have already observed, the Sons of every Father feared themselves as near together as possibly they could; Gomer and his Sons in Asia the less; Javan and his Sons in Greece, and the Islands adjoining; Shem in Persia and Ealtward. So the sons and grandchildren of Chush from the River of Gebon (their Fathers first seat) inhabited upon the same, or upon some other contiguous unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude, in a word, the Hebrews had never acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian Black-Moors, as is already remembered in the Chapter of Paradise.

|| V.

A place, Elay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chush for Ethiopia.

And as in these places before remembered, so in divers others is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia, or Chush, which puts the Story (where it is so understood) quite out of square; one Kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what fence hath this part of Scripture, Isa. 18. Vt terra Cymbalorum alarum rum que est trans flumina Æthiopiæ; or, according to the Septuagint, in these words: Te terra naxum alarum que est trans fluvios Æthiopiæ; it is to the Land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia, sending Embassadors by Sea, even the Vessels of Reeds upon the waters. Veteræ umbrose ore: it is to the Land of the shady coast, saith Junius. The former Translators understand it in this sense; That the waters are shadowed with the sails, which are significatively called the wings of the ships; the other, that the coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Isaiah, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this Message to the Israhelites, which Isaiah repeateth, and by the former Translation, every man may see the transposition of Kingdoms: for hereby Egypt is transported unto the other side of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia set next unto Judæa; when it is the Land of Cush and Arabia indeed that lieth between Judæa and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is seated under the Equinoctial Line. And of this, Berosus asketh a material question (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia; Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknown Region. Now, if Æthiopia it self be under the Equinoctial line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it again, and beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? except we shall impiously think that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or used an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000. years after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona esperanza.

§. VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terrhaca in the Story of Senacherib, and Zeraim in the Story of Ala, are unadvisedly made Æthiopians.

And by this Translation is the Story of Senacherib utterly mistaken in the cause of his retreat. For Senacherib was first repulsed at Pelissum, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judæa: when having certain knowledge that Thirrhakeh (which all the Interpreters called King of Æthiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to withdraw himself: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he sent threatening Messengers to Ezechia King of Judæa, perfwading him to submit himself: the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Have any of the gods of the Nations delivered his Land out of the hands of the King of Assur? Where is the god of Hamah, &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Jerusalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jerusalem, commanded by Rabshakeh, with the other which lay before Pelissum, a great City upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Judæa and Benjamin, with a third Army (which himself commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But upon the rumor of that Arabian Army led by the King Thirrhakeh (whom Josephus calls Tharshis) Rabshakeh halted from the siege of Hiernsalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, and set down before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleutheropolis, as some have supposed. But while he had ill success at Pelissum, and feared Thirrhakeh, God himself, whom he least feared, strook his Army before Hiernsalem by the Angel of his power, so as 180000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechieh is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Josephus himself makes it plain. For he confesseth in the tenth Book, the first Chapter of the Jews Antiquities, that it was come to Senacherib's knowledge, that the Army which was ascot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jews) marched towards him by the way of the Desert: Now, the Desert which lay indifferent between Hiernsalem and Pelissum, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabias, to wit, the Story, of which it is a part; the Desert, and the Happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelissum or Hiernsalem. But that there is any Desert between Pelissum and the South part of Egypt, hath never yet been heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this description of the second of Kings, Verſ. 9. hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Cush) is also translated Æthiopia; and in this sense have all the Interpreters (but Junius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse: He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia, &c. whereas it should have been thus converted with Junius. Audians autem de Thirrahake Rege Cushit, He heard also of Thirrahakeh King of the Chulhites. For they were the Cushites and Arabians, whose whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very smook of Judæa flaming was blown, being their nearest Neighbours: and so were not the Æthiopian Black-Moors under the Equinoctial, whom neither War nor Peace (which discovereth all Regions) ever found out, saith Pliny. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Asa King of Judæa, with an Army of a Million, and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Army, and those Chariots should pass through all Egypt (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how far distant, Judge. For Princes do not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there ever such strength of Black-Moors heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Æthiopians such Travellers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Æthiopia. But the word Cush being first so converted for Æthiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seats of Kingdoms, or the possibilities of attempts, or invasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

A farther Exposition of the place, Esaï. 18. 1.

Concerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Esaï, Navium alarum, Winged Ships (so the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbala alarum (according to the Latine) sails whistling in the winds, or terre umbrose ore (after Junius) the Land of a shadowed coast, or the Land shadowing with wings, as our English Geneva hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hieron, have one sense in effect. For the sails are commonly called the wings of a Ship; and we use to say ordinarily when our Ships sails slowly, that the wanteth wings (that is) when her sails are either worn, or too narrow: and we also use the same phrase of the wind whistling in the sails. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small ships, as their sails were said to give a shadow over the Red-Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Isaiah) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth signify both to shadow, and to gingle (which is) to make a kind of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Wo to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others safeguard, under the shadow of thy wings: which (indeed) seemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Isaiah: and this phrase is often else-where used, as in the 16. Psalm: Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me under the shadow of thy wings. The Boats of Reed (spoken of are of two kinds; either of basker-Willow covered with hides (as anciently in Britain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottom, and built up on both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I have seen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

§. I.

That Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt: and the rest of the Sons of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

The second Son of Ham was Mizraim; who (according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Cush first possit Chaldea on the West side of Gebon chiefly: and from thence, as he increased in people, so he entered Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red-Sea, and to the South-east side of Judæa. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past over into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt; and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these four brothers possit all that Tract of Land, from Gebon in Chaldea, as far to the West as the Mediterrane Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petrea, all Canaan which embraceth Galilee, Samaria, and Judea; with the two Egypti, whereof the neather is bounded by Mempbis on the South; and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North; and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Æthiopian, or Black-Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled, which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their Sons again, and all the Sons of the rest of Noah's children, fort themselves.

§. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunar years, which made their Antiquities seem more fabulous.

This flourishing Kingdom possit by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and and became Egypt, at such time as Aegyptus (otherwise Ramefles, as some think) the son of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danau, thithering him into that part of Greece, now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danaei, abandoning their proper names: that which happened 877. years after the Flood, in the time of Jofua, as Saint Augustine conjectureth out of Ensebius. But in Homer's Odyssey it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Trojane War. And before this, Egypt was known by divers other names, as Oceana, Avia, Ofyriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Jofephus citeth in his first Book against Apion) numbeth all the Kings of Egypt after Mofes departure, who consumed 353. years. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name, 330. years after Jofua, and about 1000. years after the Flood. But where Jofephus in the same Book taketh Israel to be those Hyrcs, which he also calleth Pastores, or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511. years; whom also he calleth his Ancestors (meaning the Ancestors of the Jews;) in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Aegyptians had no such Dominion as Manethon saitheth, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many years.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirm (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had Memory and Story of 13000. years; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sun twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rise among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirm, that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the Moon; whereof Ovid:

Ante Jovem genitum terras habuisse feruntur Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the Earth inhabited Ere yet the Moon did shine, or Jove was bred.

But for those 13000. years, it may well be true; seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their years by Moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100. years, whether we take their Moneths or Lunar years to have been of the first kind of 27. days and eight hours; or otherwise 29. days and twelve hours; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunar years.

§. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

Erardus Mercator, in his Chronologie, reckoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Ensebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the general Flood: and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the Creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the general Flood: which Ensebius maketh 292. years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynasty (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Salth, to have been in the year of the World 1846. which Ensebius findeth in the Worlds Age 2140. For the 16. Dynasty was begun but in the 292. year after the Flood, as they account, and continued 190. years. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynasty to endure 115. years, Ensebius reckoneth many of them at less than 100. years: for the 28. had but six years, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. years.

Now, Annus in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. years: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. year after the Flood: so as where Mercator maketh all the 15. to precede the Flood, and the 16. to have been then in being at the time of the Flood, Annus makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falsehood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annus had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. year that Nimrod, with the Sons of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinara: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth year of Nimrod's reign (which was ten years after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Egypt posselt, and a Government established in the very first year of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinara, before all partition, or any expedition far off, or near, in question: for, from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. years after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties (which Ensebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this Opinion of Pererius (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. years after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the general Flood, I do verily believe the contrary: and that not only of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled. Pererius's his words are these: *Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentor, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Aegyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred years of the World, & so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confess, that there were then both the Asyrians and other Nations.*

Now, seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving-belief, it is lawful for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I do not gain say any mans opinion out of any crossing or cavelling humours: for I think it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of union, than out of froward subtilty, and prejudicate resoluteness, to maintain factions needless, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, for this Opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soon after Adam, no, not at all before the Flood, I say; that there is no reason why we should give a less increase to the Sons of Adam, than to the Sons of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double and (after a few years) treble, is an infallible proof of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: and at that time, they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people; and in great numbers, it may in some sort appear by this, that Cain, who (being fearful that the death of Abel would have been revenged on him) withdrew himself from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the help of his own issues, built a City (called Enoch) after the name of his first-born. Now, if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinara with so many multitudes as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was given but 130. years by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phaleg) but one hundred and one year: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the Infancy of the first Age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. years the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. years after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. years) as well Assyria, Syria, and Egypt might be posselt before the Flood, as they were within the same or less time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Story of the Babylonian and Asyrian Empire; that all those people, which we increased in the first 100. or 130. years after the Flood, came into Shinara and Babylonia. For that ever Noah himself came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it; so all probable conjecture and reason itself denies it. Again; those multitudes and powerful numbers which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her own Army of three millions (and the left not all her Kingdoms empty) do well prove, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few years after the Flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their own account, Ninus governed Babylonia and Assyria but 292. years after the Flood of Noah. And these Troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Eastern Kingdoms, from Media to the Mediterranean Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her invasion somewhat less or more than 360. years: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confess that in respect of the strange greatness of Semiramis Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered; this is short a time as can well be given. And if but one half be true of that which is said; That her Army consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horse-men, it must needs be; that long before Semiramis Reign, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of people: yea, Arabia itself (much part whereof is barren)

must long before this time of seminis, have been plentifully peopled; when Ninus having a determination to make himself Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in league with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or fought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now, if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Justine) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was born. For these be his own words, speaking of Ninus: *Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Egypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterward the Babylonians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesius numb'reth the Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Foot-men, and 200000. Horse-men: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster's Army was far short of this, yet it was greater than all those parts of the World ever since beheld. But to what end should I seek for foreign Authority? for no man doubteth, but that Egypt was peopled by Mixraim, the Son of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdom, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell us. And sure, to prepare and cultivate a desolate and overgrown ground, to beautify it with many Cities, Laws, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few days: and therefore it must be inhabited in a less time than 200. years after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many millions of men were found within 300. years after the general Flood; so as not only Babylon, and Assyria, Babylonia, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea, the far off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be comprehended, which 1656. years brought forth before the Flood? even abundance, which cannot be refuted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the known World; especially, where death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Son, till he had beheld living Nations of his own body.*

§. V.

Of some other Reasons against the Opinion of Petorius.

For what a strange increase did the long lives of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. years? Surely we have reason to doubt, that the World could not contain them, rather than they were not spread over the World. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in the Age of the World: wherein if one exceed 50. years, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we find no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by Wars, or Pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the Earth, with all the industry of man, could not give them food. What strange heaps then of Souls had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800. or 900. years, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which have been born in Brittain since three or four hundred years before the Norman Conquest (having such as by accident, or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamy might have been increased. For (to omit that the Giants and mighty Ones of the first Age observed no Law of Matrimony) it is to be thought, that those Lovers of the World and of Pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which nature had given them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could fly from, or eschew. For what humane argument hath better persuasion to make men careless of life, and fearfuls of death, than the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many pains and diseases, which this envious old Age of the World mingleth together, and loweth with the seeds of Mankind?

Now, if that Berosus or Annius may be alleged for sufficient Authours, whom Petorius himself in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Joseph confirmed, that the City of Enoch was seated near Libanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cain's time, I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Province of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times between his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. years. And sure, though this fragment of Berosus with Annius his

Comment

Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be rejected. Therefore S. Hierome, for such Authours gives a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitium contraria; Let us choose what is good in them, and reject the rest. And certainly, in the very beginning of the first Book, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the general Flood: and in that first Part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all Nations, and subjected the universal World: and though that phrase (Of all the World) be often used in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hierusalem Jews, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven: yet by the words which follow in Berosus, it is plain, that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth, from the Sun rising to the Sun setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his Sons at adventure, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the Earth was more passable, and easie to travel over before the Flood, than after it. For Petorius himself confesseth, that Attica (by reason of mud, and slime which the water left upon the Earth) was uninhabited 200. years after Ogges Flood; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleasure in passing into farr Countreys, after the general Deluges, when the Earth lay (as it were) incopied for 100. or 120. years together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautifull, and less cumbersome to walk over, in the first Age, than after the general overflowing.

§. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. Vers. ult. whereupon Petorius grounded his Opinion.

Lastly, whereas Petorius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis; And out of these were the Nations divided after the Flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it appeareth (saith Petorius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirm out of the tenth of Genesis, because the division of Tongues was the cause of the dispersion of the people.

This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: The Text itself rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the Earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided: out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever fence may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the Flood, or to any plantation or division in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the Earth could be divided after the Flood; but Noah's Sons, wherein doeth that necessary division controul the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleged, that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and general plantation: as Berosus says well, that when man-kind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas novas fides necessitas compellebat. They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations: For we find (as it is before said) that within 300. years after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies such multitudes, as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers; with their increase, for any long time; all Asia, the Greater and the Lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Britannia, and Lybia, being also at that time fully peopled. And if we believe Berosus, then not only those parts of the World, but (within 140. years after the Flood) Spain, Italy, and France were also planted: much more then may we think, that within 1656. years before the Flood, in the time of the chief strength of mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly, seeing all the World was overflowed, there were people in all the World which offended.

§. VII.

A Conclusion, relating of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phur (another son of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

Therefore, for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Aleator, nor judge with the Volgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I do not think the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Petorius or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, that

Egypt

Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. years more or less after Adam, there might remain unto the Sons of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of Stone or Metal) of their former Kings or Governors: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Ephigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters, and the Art of Astronomy was known to the Babylonians 3634. years before Alexander's Conquest: and this report Ammius findeth to agree, and reach to the time of Enoch, who was born 1034. years before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ's coming in judgment, as Saint Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgments, and every man to his own reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Egyptus, the Son of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis, or Nicopolis, to the Mediterrane Sea, was called the Inferiour Egypt; furnished also Delta: because the several branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the form of a Greek Letter Delta which is the form of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east, and embraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Sir and Pharaw, had on it the City of Pelufium, where Sennacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yielded it self to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Egypt is bounded between Memphis and Syene near Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of the ancient City of Thebes; which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks, Dispolis; in the Scriptures No-bahon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding belief. Josephus calls Egypt, Morphi of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebaïs.

Phut, the third Son of Ham, took the next portion of Land to his Brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutis (saith Josephus) and Phny mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chub, and Lud were contemni, and associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

|| I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven Sons.

Canaan (the fourth Son of Ham) possesseth all that Region, called by the Romans Palestina; in the Scriptures Galilea, Samarita, and Judea; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are precisely set down by Moses, Genesis the tenth. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar until Azzah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Adma and Leboim, even unto Laisa. Now; howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was, that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North; Sodom and Gomorrah the East, and the other Cities named, stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza in the way of Egypt: the uttermost Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now, the Sons of Canaan which possesse this Countrey, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven.

1. Zidon.
2. Heth, or Chethus.
3. Jebusi, or Jebusam.
4. Emori, or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgasi, or Girgizans.
6. Hevi, or Chivvius.
7. Ark, or Harkus.
8. Seni, or Sinens.
9. Arvadi, or Arvadans.
10. Zemari, or Samaricus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi, or Hamatibis, or Chamidians.

Of which the most renowned were the Hebitis, Gergesites, Amorites, Hevites, Jebusites, and Perizaites: which Perizaites were descended of Zemari, or Samaricus; or from some of his.

|| II.

|| II.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first-born of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asser: for Asser, Zabulon, and Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phenicia distributed among them; but the Asserites could never obtain Zidon it self.

The second Son of Canaan was Heth, or Cethus: of whom came the Hebitis, or Hittites, one of those seven principal Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizaites, the Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron, near the Torrent Bejor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, having the Desert of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus Juramenti) four miles from Gaza, dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the North-east as Hebron, and Manne, and of Ephraim the Hittite, did Abraham buy the Field of Sarabs burial. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her self to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the seventh of the Kings; Israhel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

|| II I.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

Jebusam, the third Son of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principal seat was Jebus (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Countrey near it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Solomon.

Amoreus was the fourth Son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the Mountains of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (overthrown by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus, in the edge of Ce- losyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountains of Juda, and in Idumaea, near the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometimes called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, we find in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite, before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oak.

|| IV.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites and Harkites.

The fifth Son of Canaan was Gergesius, or Gergeson (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East-side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolemy sets the City Geresa, which Josephus calls Gera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossessed the possessor with devils, and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts, because their Swine, filled with the evil Spirit, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee: Gergesius also built Beritus (sometime Ceris) afterward Felix Julia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phenicia: in which the Romans gave a Garrison: and to which Augustus gave many large privileges.

Hevens the sixth Son, and Father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the War of Jofia, and afterward to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Judas the third: They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The seventh Son was Araceus, or Harkis, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterrane Sea (over against Tripolis) built the City of Archos, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Aracbis.

|| V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

Sineus the eighth Son, Hierosolymitanus sits at Caparcorfa, which Ptolemy finds in Judea, not far from Jebus: to the South thereof, saith Junius. But it is more probable, bable, that Sineus founded Sin, which Saint Hierome calls Sin: Ptolemy, Sinagra; Mela, and Pliny, Synairus; Brocard, Syon (called Synochis) near Arca. Peverius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Desarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brocard, who took view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Sinochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini, written with the letter C. (otherwise Kenzi) who descended of Hobab the Son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the wilderness of Pharan. But the Cinai were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, beside their inhabitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinai, Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Affrians.

The ninth Son was Aradeus, or Arvadens, who in the Isle of Aradus built the City Arados: opposite against which Island, on the Main of Phenicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came Saint Peter (saith Clement) and in this Isle preached the Gospel, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but we find no such work of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skillfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembereth in his Prophecies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy Mariners.

¶ V I. Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth Son, there are divers Opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Celestria at Edessa, and founded samaraim, which in Joshua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also samarajim (of the same Orthography) upon the Mountain of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chron. c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine converteth amils (saith he) by Semerem. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the Parent of the Emiziani, which Pliny calls the Hemisseni, in Celestria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthography, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproveth: And he bought the Mountain Samaria, or Shemeron, of one Shemar, for two Talents of Silver, and built in the Mountain; and called the name of the City which he built, after the name of Shemar, Lord of the Mountain, Samaria. But of all these places I shall speak more at large in the Conquest of the Holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritans were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Jews stood up, they always called themselves Jews: when it suffered, or sunk, they then utterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Affrians, and partly of the Naturals.

¶ VII. Of Hamathi.

THE last of Canaan's Sons was Hamathbeus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath (saith Beroaldus): of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamathbeus was present. Josephus, and Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, between the Mountain Cassius, and the Province of Pteria, and Seleucia, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were born; but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth between Apamea and Emesa in Cassitis. Yet indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than ever any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Province of Laodicea between it and any part of the Land divided. And if Libanon is self were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces, Laodicea, and Libanica, are between Epiphania and any part of the Holy Land: and therefore Emath fo taken, could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Joshua is directly proved. For Joshua counting the Lands that remained unpossessed, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunrising, from Baalgad under Mount Hermion, until we come to Hamathi. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in in Nephthalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because David accepted the presents of Tobu King of Emath, and (therewithal) conditions of peace: which he would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight: For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Joshua: for Emath is indeed situated on the other side of the Mountain of Hermion, which joyneth to Libanus; and is otherwise called Iurea. But whereas Hamathi is named in Joshua 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conversion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iurea is that over the Mountains, and the City in Nephthalim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (understanding the difference) write it Amath and not Emath, the same which indeed belongeth to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Affidim: which City S. Hierome writes Emath; Josephus, Hamah; others, Ematim, or Amatheos, and the people Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabshakeb vaunteth in the second of Kings. Where is the God of Hamath?

The Sons of Chush were,	Sheba , Havila , Saba , Raama , Sabteca , Nimrod .	And the Sons of Raama were,	Sheba , Dedan .
-------------------------	---	-----------------------------	----------------------------------

¶ I.

That most of the Sons of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Job: and of the Queen that came to Solomon.

Sheba or Saba was the eldest son of Chush, the eldest Son of Han; to make a difference between Him and his Nephew Sheba, the Son of his Brother Raama or Regma. (or Regma after Montanus) his name is written with a single (s) samech, and Sheba the Son of Regma with an (s) asperat, which is the

Hebrew, Schin. Sheba the eldest Son of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the Son of Regma, possesse both the shores of Arabia Felix. Saba took that part towards the Red-Sea, as nearest his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulf of Perfis, of which Pliny saith, Sabei, Arabum populi, proper thura clarissimi, aditruque maria porrectis gentibus habitant; The Sabaeans, people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian or Red-Sea. This Country was afterwards called Arabia, a populi mixtionem, saith Ptolemaeus. To this agreeth Ptolemy, who setteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red-Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Persian; with whom also we may leave Saba: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolemy, because he remembereth a Nation (called Stabae) near the Persian Sea; and Majabatha which defended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama, into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Josephus, who only attended his own fancies, hath banished Saba or Sheba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinks it strange, that the Sabei, which stole away Job's Cattel, should run through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petrea, and find out Job in Tracantha, between Palaestina and Celestria, 1200. miles off. Now, as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, so do I think, that neither the Sabei on the Red-Sea, nor those towards the Persian Sea, could by any means execute the stealth upon Job, which soever Beroaldus shall take for nearest. But these were the Sabei of Arabia the Desert, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth, out of his own experience, that the City Saba is seated: the same which Ptolemy calls Sava, now Semiscasac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Desert, came those Magi or Wise-men, which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose words are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Cristophorus Hieronymus, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise-men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desert: which City, when my self was there, was (as I judged it) called Semiscasac. And to approve this Sheba were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disjoyned with large Deserts, as there is no possibility for strangers to pass them, especially with any numbers of Cattel, both in respect of the Mountains, of the sands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Ubi nec bosuine, nec bestie videntur, nec aves, imò nec arbores, nec graven aliquod, sed non nisi montes, saxa, altissimi, asperissimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, nor birds, no, not so much as trees, or any pasture or grass, but only sharp, and high, stony, and craggie mountains. Beraaldus and Fervius conceive, that the Queen of Saba, which came to visit Solomon, was of the Sabæi, on the East side of Arabia felix; but the contrary seems more probable, and that she was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea; for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petrea, betwixt Idumea and the Red Sea, as far down as Midian, or Madian, and Ezion Gaber; and this Queen of Saba, which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might, without any far travel, enter his Territories, free from all danger of surprize by any other Prince or Nation.

But, to avoid tediousness, it is manifest that Saba, or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sons, Sheba and Dedan, and Sabtica, were all the possessors of Arabia the Happy, and the Defart: onely Havilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side of Chus, who held Arabia Petrea. Now, for Sabta, there is found of his Name, the City of Sbatba, or Sabota in the fame Arabia: of which both Pliny and Ptolemy; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the walls whereof there was sometimes found sixty Temples. Ezechiel joyneth the Father and the Son together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Eastern Arabians; their Merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Josephus his fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Aftabari, they be not worthy any farther Answer then hath already been given: especially seeing these Cities, preserving the memory of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolemy's time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adjoining, the names of other of the brethren of the Family of Chus, with little alterations, are preserved. In Arabia the Defart, is found the City of Saba, or Sava (now Semisafac) with the City of Rhegma for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolemy himself called Raabent of Raamah. In Arabia the Happy, is found the City of Rhegama, and Rabana; which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the City of Saptha, or Saptab, not far from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiet City in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha, and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea, the great City of Saba; and the Nation adjoining, Sabai; and to the South thereof again toward the freight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all these his brothers and nephews which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Havilah by the passage of Tygris was a neighbour, to whom he might pass by Boat, even unto Rhegma the City of Raama, or Rhegma, yet near the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolemy's time.

§. II.

Josephus his Opinion of Dedan, one of the Issue of Chus, to have been seated in the West Ethiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremy.

And whereas Josephus (whom in this Saint Hierom followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the Son of Raamid into the West Ethiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba and Raamah and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba and Raamah in 22. Verse, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Ethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) above four thousand miles. Besides which, the Merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black Moors. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious cloaths for thy Chariots; and these Western Ethiopians never saw cloth, till the Portugals, seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the Merchandise of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants Teeth, some Gold and Amber, Civer-Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for Linnen, or Iron chiefly.

But in those days, the West part of Africa, within the body of the Land, was known only by imagination: and, being under the burnt Zone, was held uninhabitable. And therefore, that the Negroes of the West Ethiopia, which inhabit about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either pass by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottom of the Mediterranean Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancy. Now, to put it out of dispute, that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chus, which seats they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet; let us hear Hieremy his own words: Fly ye inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Elau upon him. Hereby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumea is a Province of Arabia Petrea: and Dedan, which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, joined in that part to Petrea, the seat of his Grand-father Chus; which neighbourhood of Dedan and the Idumeans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

§. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Verse 7.

The termination in the Hebrew, is commonly a figure of the plural number, as in the Latin.

Chap. 45.
v. 9.

After Chus, it followeth to speak of Mizraim's Sons, whose names (saith Saint Augustine) were plural, to signify the Nations which came of them. Ludim, the elder Son of Mizraim, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adjoining. Among the Sons of Shem, there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the Son of Shem being written Lud; the Son of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the Son of Mizraim was the Parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not far from Mizraim his Father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who joined them in this sort together: Come up ye Horites, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moors, and the Lybians which bear the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians, being of one Parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are joined together. Ethiopia (or Chus) saith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. and Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league, shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the Sons of Chus (which were the Chusites) the Sons of Mizraim (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his Son Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, shall fall together. Hieronymianus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I believe it: because Hieremie joyneth the Lybians and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrews called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they seem to be called Lubim, or Lubei, a name somewhat near the word Lybie, and by which it may seem that the truer writing is, not Lybie, but Lybiei. Nei- ther is it here to be omitted, that Ptolemy (upon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) understandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will have this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a City (saith he) between Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not milke, if the City of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda, with a double d, and is the same City which was afterward Diospolis, in which S. Peter cured Aeneas of the Palsy) standeth near the Torrent Gams, not far from Joppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder: For there are many Cities of one name, founded in all the Regions of the World, and far asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia and Antiochia: so of divers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third Son of Mizraim: and so doth Postellus; and either Opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraim's Sons have no proper Countreys given them in the Scriptures, having Casubim and Capstorum, of whom came the Philistini, whom the Scriptures call Pelestei.

These Casubim inhabited Cassotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountain Cassus are found, not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Capstorum seated near Casubim in that Tract of Egypt called Setbrois, not far from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Setbrois; Stephanus and Pliny, Setbrois, of the City Setbron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemy calls Herculis parva. Of the Casubim and Capstorum came the Philistini, which are called by the septuagint Allosybi (which is) Alienigena, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistini inhabited the South part of the Holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) do not use the letter (p) but instead of it (ph). Their principal Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gaseti, Ascalonites, Azotites, Gethai, and Accaronites: Isidore affirms, that Ascalon was first called Philistini; and of that City the Countrey adjoining. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first known King of the Philistini, was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written, that he was also King of the Philistini, in these these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistines unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some antienter Abimelech governed the Common-wealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistines commanded that Tract of Land upon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Caesarea Palaestina, or Straton's Tower) which was the South border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Giants were of these Philistines: and Goliath was of Geth, one of the five Cities above named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Lysanias. They mastered the Israelites at several times above 150. years, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Samson and Samuel; but in the end, this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

It is Objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adjoining, were held by the Sons of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispose of the Sons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Peregrinus, that although the Palestinians or Philistines held it in the time of Joshua, yet at the time of the Promise it was possessed by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Heuties dwelt in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvel, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistines were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Jeremy witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistines: the remnant of the issue of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistines are said to be the reliques of Caphtorim: Have not I brought up Israel out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philistines from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? so I read this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, and Palestinians de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conversion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, between Ptolomais and Bazre and Apollonia; but Kir in Asia under the Assyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene, and so hath the Geneva. But Peregrinus calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the Less. For whether they inhabited sethetres, or Cappadocia of Pale- stina, it is not certainly known. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Toglatphalassar King of the Assyrians carried away the inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Josephus seems to understand this Kir of Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captured.

§. XV.

Of the issue of Sem.

§. I.

Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speak of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Elam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

The posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Story of the Hebrews: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five Sons, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the Children of him and Aram; the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsal of their names, saving that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also reacheth us that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (saying India) which I believe Noah himself first inhabited: and to whom Opbir and Havilah the Sons of Jothan afterward repaired: Hi filii Sem ab Euphrate fluvio partem Asia usque ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These & sons of Sem (saith

Of which see in the second Book, Chap. 7. Sect. 3.

(St. Hierom) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered, Abi 2. v. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of use and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witness Daniel) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolemy) in Daniel, Ulai: and seated in the border of Susiana.

Assur (as most Historians believe) the second Son of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdain the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon; or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath been in this Story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speak much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane letters there is large, and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib, who was one of the powerfulst Princes among them, had yet the Mountain Taurus for the utmost of his Dominion towards the North-east, and Syria bounded him towards the West, notwithstanding these vanta of Senacherib in Ezay the 37. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Releph, and the children of Eden which were at Telassar? Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Sepharuaim, Hena and Ivah? All these were indeed but petty Kings of Cities, and small Countries, as Haran in Mesopotamia: Releph in Palmyrena: Hanath or Emath in Iturda, under Libanus: the Isle of Eden: Sephar, and others of this sort. Yea, Nebuchadonozor, who was most powerful before the conquest of Egypt, had but Chaldaea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina, and Phenicia, parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speak my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose Plantation I have omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire: from whom the most memorable story of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith Saint Hierom and Josephus; but it must be those Chaldeans about Ur: For the Sons of Cham posselt the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrews: For Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Son of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Asia the less, is the common opinion; taken from Josephus and Saint Hierom; but I see not by what reason he was moved to straggle thither from his friends.

§. II.

Of Aram, and his Sons.

Aram the first and last Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (saith Eusebius out of Josephus) which Syrus lived before Moses was born; the same which others call the Son of Apollo. Mesopotamia also, being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharajim, which is as much to say, as, Syria duorum fluviorum; Syria compassed with two Rivers, (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greeks Mesopotamia simply.

Aric and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy Mothers Father; and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembereth it by the antient name of Arames, or Aramea, as these his own words converted witness: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ip. 19. si Syri Aramensis & Arameos vocant; Those ip. 19. whom we call Syrians (saith he) themselves call Arameans and Arameans.

Against this opinion, that Aram the Son of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not only of those in Syria Inter-Amur, which is Mesopotamia) (some read, Genes. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where others out of the original read Kemuel, the Son of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to understand the word (Aram) here, not of the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the History of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel Posterity could be famous) we find Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition, sometimes with Naharajim, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from from another Aram, which (as it seems) then also was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks, in his Notes upon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan-Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia (to wit) to that part which Ptolemy calls Ambaritis (so called from the River Chaboras, which, dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous use of Padan Aram, and Aram Nabarajim (which latter appellation unquestionably comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seem to refute this Opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agreeth with this Region: because the two Rivers (as it were) yoked together go along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two Cities, in Ptolemy, called Aphadana (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaboras, the other upon Euphrates.

Uz, or Hus, inhabited about Damascus, and built that City, saith Josephus and Saint Hierom. But Tostatus mistaking this Opinion, both in them and in Zyza, who also followeth Josephus, affirmeth, that Abraham's Steward, Eliezer, was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus, the eldest Son of Aram, dwelt near unto his Father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adjoining to Arabia the Desert, and to Batanea, or Tracanit; whereof the Prophet Jeremy : Rejoice and be glad, O Edom, daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Tracanit; adjoining to Basan, having Batanea Gaulonit, and the Mountain Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: having in it many Cities and People, as may also be gathered out of Jeremy : And all sorts of people, and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the Son of Nabor, the Brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierom) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Hul, the second Son of Aram, S. Hierom makes the Father of the Armenians; and Gether, the third son, Parent to the Acarnanians, or Carians : which Opinion (because I find not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should leave the fellowship of his own Brethren, and dwell among strangers in Asia the less. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolemy setteth the City of Cholte.

Gether (saith Josephus) founded the Edriani : but Josephus gave all Noah's children feathers, to carry them far away in all haste. For mine own Opinion, I always keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and think with Junius (to wit) That Gether seated himself near his Brothers in the Body of Syria, and in the Province of Cassiotis, and Seleucia, where Ptolemy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Mes, or Mesch the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, near the Mountain Mafius. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be known than by this probability, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region took name) planted his Sons in the same Land about him : for he wanted no scope of Territory for himself and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred years after : and therefore there is no reason to call them in the Desert parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessary and policy held them together for a while ; so ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these Sons of Aram, and the Sons of the rest of Noah's children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdom; yet therein every one also sought a Province apart, and to themselves; giving to the Cities therein built, their own names, thereby to leave their memory to their Posterity : the use of letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Provinces : every one emulating and disdaining the greatness of other, as they are thereby to this day subject to invasion, expulsion, and destruction : so as Nova Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countreys are unaccessible to strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Mes, the fourth Son, is made the Parent of the Meonians : of whom something hath been spoken already. Arphaxad, the third Son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two Sons, Phaleg and Jossan : and in Phaleg's time was the Earth divided.

of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sons of Heber, of the issue of Scm.

THE many People which at the division (at Phaleg's birth) were then living, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt; whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrews (saith Peregrinus out of Seidar Holati, one of their Chronicles) affirm that this partition hapned at the death of Phaleg; and Phaleg was born in the year after the Flood 101. and lived in all 239. years, which numbers added, make 340. And therefore was it so many years after the Flood, ere the children of Noah severed themselves. But to this Opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make, how in so few years as 101. (the time of Phaleg's birth) so many people could be increased, Peregrinus gives this Answer, That if 70. persons of the Family of Jacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. years (besides women, children and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soon after the Flood the children of Noah might, in a shorter time, bring forth many multitudes, having received the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the Earth : What strength this Answer hath, let others judge : for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. years time : and the Sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeares of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the division, in memory thereof : as Josephus and S. Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the division were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham's before his birth) then was the division 38. years after Ninus, who governed 52. years : in the 43. year of whose Reign Abraham was born. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. years before this division (as this division is placed by the Hebrews, Hierom and Chrysostom) then was the Earth so peopled in all the East and Northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time since. For Ninus, associating to himself Arizus King of Arabia, a People who at that time (saith Diodorus Siculus) plurimum opibus atque armis prestabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; received Barzanis into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified

Pharus the King thereof, with his Wife and seven Children; vanquished all those Regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Pharicians, the Kingdom of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the number which followed Ninus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others : and Zoroaster on this other side who made resistance with 600000. prove it sufficiently, that if the division had not hapned before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no division at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their portions, as they sought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis : wherefore in this Opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit, that if the division had been made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers born to fill the Earth : It was never meant that the Earth could be filled every where at the very instant, but by times and degrees. And surely, whatsoever mens Opinions have been herein, yet it is certain, that the division of Tongues and of Men must go neer together with the ceasing of the work at Babel : and that the enterprise of Babel was left off instantly upon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the division; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg : for Phaleg was born in the year 101. after the Flood, which was the year that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or ten years after he arrived, saith Berosus.

Now, if it be objected, That Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth Division) must have lived without a name, except the name had been given him at the time of this confusion and partition : to this Objection, it may answered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures; for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom, Eduz; and that Phaleg being a principal man in this division, had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrews, Saint Hierom, and Chrysostom, account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giving his Son the name Phaleg, he foretold the division which followed : to this I say, I do not find that Heber deferred any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his Son : for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophecy (if any such had been) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards wards fell amongst the Hebrews themselves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the Building of the Tower and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proof) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Babel took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

||. IV.

Of the sons of Jostan, the other Son of Heber.

- The Sons of Jostan were,
1. Elmodad.
 2. Saleph, or Salep, or Skeleph.
 3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
 4. Jare, or Jaraah, or Jerath.
 5. Hadoram.
 6. Uzal, or Uxal.
 7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
 8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
 9. Arimacl.
 10. Sheba, or Seba.
 11. Ophir, or Opr.
 12. Havilah, or Chavila, and
 13. Jobab.

As those Sons of Jostan (according to Saint Hierom) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, even from the River Copbe or Chows, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of those thirteen Sons cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being general: And their dwelling was from Melha as thou goest unto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteen Sons, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names, to avoid confusion, it is to be observed, that among the Sons of Chus, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba, or Sheba, his Grand-child by his wife Retura. But Seba the Son of Chus, and Sheba the Son of Rhegma his Nephew we have left in Arabia felix; and Havilah the Son of Chus upon Tygris. Saba the Grand-child of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sabeans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ maketh mention; Primum Sabai; post hos sunt Passiagarde; prope vero hos sunt Taci: The first are Sabeans; after these be Passiagarde; and near these the Taci. And whereas it is written

Gen. 25. 6. ten. But unto the Sons of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his Son (while he yet lived) Eastward to the East-Country:

Hierom upon it is supposed, that this Saba the Son of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthest East-Country in respect of Judea; which also Ovid setteth under the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's Sons leaved themselves on the borders of Judea: I rather choose to leave Saba the Son of Abraham in Arabia the Desert, where Ptolemy setteth a City of that name.

But Saba, the Son of Jostan, the Son of Heber (as I conceive) inhabited India itself. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greek Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabei. Taxis hos inter medios habitaque Sabaus; in the midst of these dwell the Sabai, and the Taxis, saith Dionysius.

||. V.

Of Ophir one of Jostan's Sons, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Solomon.

Ophir also was an inhabitant of the East India, and (as St. Hierom understands it) in one of the Islands plentiful with Gold, which are now known by the name of Molucca. Josephus understands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a general name are called cherfonse, or Peninsule: of which there are two very notorious; Callect and Malacoe. Pererius takes it rightly for an Island, as St. Hierom doth, but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arius Montanus, out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called into the West Sea; by others, Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others, Mare pacificum. The words, in the second of the Chronicles, are these: And he overlaid the house with precious stones for beauty; and the gold was gold of Paravaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Town in Characene, a Province of Sushana, called Barbatia, so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which David preserved for the enriching of the Temple.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who alio took Ophir for Peru. And that this Question may be a subject of no further dispute; it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am, that at least, America hath none, nor any City, Village or Mountain so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, riches, and dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards, utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signs (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a River, or Torrent, or Brook that ran by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brook, or of Water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly understood them, set it down in the Diurnal of their enterprise, and so in the first description made, and sent over to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama, had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever since, as divers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Jesuite in his natural and moral History of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) took that name of Jostan, who as he supposeth navigated from the utmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Jucatan is nothing else in the language of that Country, but [What is that?] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the Salvages answered Jucatan (which is) What ask you, or What say you? The like happened touching Paria, a Mountainous Country on the South side of Trinidad, and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men do) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hills afar off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as, high Hills or Mountains. For at Paria begins that marvellous ledg of Mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and so hath that Country ever since retained the name of Paria.

The same happened among the Englishs, which I sent under Sir Richard Greenvile to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the Salvages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as, Thou wear good cloaths, or gay cloaths. The same happened to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Island Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that self place which the Sea encompassed, they answered, Caeri, which signifieth an Island. And in this manner have many places, newly discovered, been entituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leave Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout such an Island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now, although there may be found Gold in Arabia it self (towards Persia) in Havilah, now Sushana, and all alongst that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certain Islands planted by the Spaniards, from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Solomon's Ships made from the Red-Sea (which was three years in going and coming) it seemeth they went to the uttermost East; as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeed these that now go from Portugal, or from hence, finish that navigation in two years, and sometimes less: and Solomon's Ships, went not above a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they evermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the use of the compass was known, it was impossible to navigate a-thwart the Ocean; and therefore Solomon's Ships could not find Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not been for the plenty of Gold in the East India Islands, far above the Mines of any one place of America) to sail every year to the West part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted; and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they built a City called Manilia. Solomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the East, to have sped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those days, whereas he had no coast to have guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a fantastical Opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whose mountains of Gold are kept by Griffins: which mountains Solimus affirmed to be in Scythia Asiatia, in these words: Nam cum Auro & Gemmis affluant, Griffes tenent universa, alites ferocissimae, Arimapsi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countries abound in Gold and rich Stones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kind of Fowl, the fierce of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people, called Arimapsi, make Warr. These Arimapsi are said to have been men with one eye onely, like unto the Cyclops of Sicilia: of which Cyclops, Herodotus, and Aristotle make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Book: and Valerius Flaccus: and D. Siculus, in the Story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine own Opinion) I believe none of them. And for these on) I take it that this name signifying Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying one-eyed, was first given them, by reason that they used to wear a vizzard of defence, which they used to serve both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Pliny, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Cysitiron, or the Cave of the North-east wind. For the rest, as all Fables were commonly grounded upon some true Stories, or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this moral: That if those men, which fight against so many dangerous passages for Gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of half their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subject themselves to famine, corrupt air, violent heat and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this Fable be feigned in this plate, yet, if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend mountains of Gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the World, especially in America, many high and impassable mountains, which are very rich and full of Gold, inhabited only with Tigers, Lions, and other ravenous and cruel Beasts: unto which, if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to find the same war that the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the Gold, or seek to defend that metal, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young ones, they grow enraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said, that the Alegartos (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearls which lie in the Lakes of the In-land: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the Pearl. And though the Alegartos know not the Pearl, yet they find favour in the flesh and blood of the Indians, whom they devour.

||. VI.

Of Havilah the Son of Joctan, who also passed into the East-Indies: and of Melcha and Sepher named in the bordering of the Families of Joctan: with a Conclusion of this Discourse touching the plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the Son of Joctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the general Opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East-India, in the Continent, from which Ophir pass into the Islands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East-India, which took name of Havilah the Son of Joctan: but Havilah which Pisyon compasseth, was also called of Havilah, the Son of Chus, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: And I made the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comest to: 1 Sam. 7. But, that Saul 7. 7. ever made war in the East-India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen Sons of Joctan, these three, Saba, Havilah, and Ophir; though at the first seated by their Brethren about the Hill Mafius, or Mefh, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) between Cilicia and Meopotamia; yet, at length, either themselves, or their issues removed into the East-India, leaving the other Families of Joctan, to fill the Countreys of their first plantations, which the Scripture defines to have been from Mefh unto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mefh to be a Region of the East-India, and Sephar a Mountain of the same (which Mountain, Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) those fancies are far beyond my understanding. For, the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judea, is never farther extended than unto Persia. But Mefh is that part of the Mountain of Mafius in the North of Meopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras springeth, which runneth by Charan: and in the same Region we also find for Sephar (remembered by Moses) Sipphar by Ptolemy, standing to the East of the Mountain Mafius: from whence, Joctan having many Sons, some of them might pass into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in process of time.

The other fashion of Planting I understand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountain in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is used: as in Numbers 22. Balaac the King of Moab ref. 1. hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountain of the East; which was from the East part of Meopotamia: For Balaac brought Balaam out of Meopotamia (witnesseth this place of Deuteronomy): Because they lived Balaam the Son of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Nabharajim, to curse thee: for Aram Nabharajim was Syria superiorum, which is Meopotamia, as afore said.

This plantation of the World after the Flood

Floud doth best agree (as to me it seems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of reason and probable conjecture; the guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to go after; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies, be they ancient or modern. Neither have I any end herein, private or publick, other than the discovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himself hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these later Times) have, by their many Volumes of untrue reports, left Honour without a Monument, and Virtue without Memory: and (in stead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkest forgetfulness ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And although the length and dissolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the Worlds first Planters after the Flood (I mean the greatest number, and most part of them) yet all the footsteps of Antiquity (as appears by that which hath been spoken) are not quite worn out, nor over-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Eabel; Phenicia hath Zidon, to which City the eldest Son of Canaan gave name; so hath Cilicia, Tharsis; and the Armenians, Meder, Hibernian, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Adumans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, have preserved from the dearth of forgetfulness some signs of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Beginning and Establishment of Government.

S. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of the Families to be Regal, and from Regal absolute, to Regal tempered with Laws.

IT followeth now, to intreat how the World began to receive Rule and Government; which (while it had scarcity of people) under-went no other Dominion than Paternity and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was always used, both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Gravity: the same bearing one signification almost in all Languages. For in the Eleventh of Numbers; God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Governors over them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense which the Latine word Senes, or Seniores doth: So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly believed them as those that were the Elders and Judges of the people. And so in the words of those false Judges and Whorellers to Daniel, Shew it unto us, seeing God hath given thee the Office of an Elder. Demosthenes useth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedaemonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur, Senes; Among the Lacedaemonians, the chief Magistrates, as they were, so they are called, Eldermen: And again, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellissent Senatam; If reason and advisement were not in old men, our Ancestours had never called the highest Council by the name of Senate.

But, though these reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not, but in this name of (Elder) for Governors, or Counsellors of State, there is a sign that the first Governors were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard, take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loysseus) puissance in propriety, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: The one, Potestas aut imperium, Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Propriety or mastership: The correlative of the one is the Subject; of the other, the Slave. Ad Casareni (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet; ad singulos proprietas; Caesar hath power over all, and every man propriety in his own: And again, Cesar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominiis; Caesar holdeth all in his power; and every every man possesseth his own. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience (the fruit of natural reverence, which but from excellent seed seldom ripeneth) being exceedingly overshadowed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of Paternal persuasions (after man-kind began to neglect and forget the Original and first giver of life) became in all over-weak, either to resist the first inclination of evil, or after (when it became habitual) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were only guided and steered by their own fancies, and toft to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the World, while Wisdom was severed from power, and strength from charity: Necessity (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the wife and foolish understand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable than that of beasts, and that a general flood of confusion would a second time over-flow them, did they not, by a general obedience to Order and Dominion, prevent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equal from equal received equal harms. Infomuch, that the licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved, upon a better trial, no less perilous than unindurable bondage.

These Arguments, by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, persuaded all Nations which the Heavens cover, to subject themselves to a Master, and to Magistracy in some degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it less evil, than the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that observe it) found some imperfection and corrosive in this cure. And therefore the same Necessity which invented, and the same Reason which approved, Sovereign power, brought it self of certain equal rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundless) might also discern her own limits. For before the invention of Laws, private affections in supreme Rulers made their own fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen; measuring by this Yard, and weighing in this Balance, both good and evil.

For as wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inventions of Laws. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro-

gibus erant; The people were not governed by any other laws than the wills of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those men's Virtues leave them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those men's Vices deforme them that were. Amor interduum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt: Love sees one while too much, another while shew nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few years (for discretion and restraint of Royal power) Laws were established: and that Government which had this mixture of equality (holding in an even Balance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regal: the other (which had it not) was known for Tyrannical: the one, God established in favour of his people; the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regal authority, Princes as they were chosen for their virtues only, so did they measure their powers by a great deal of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, Deorum & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dei & dii; Princes because they were just and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessity; yet it was God himself that first kindled this light in the minds of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himself by his eternal providence having ordained Kings; and the Law of Nature, Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees have their Prince; the Deer their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their own safety. The most high beareth rule over the Kingdoms of Men; and appointeth over it whomsoever he pleaseth. By me (saith Wisdom, spoken by the Son of God) Kings reign; By me Princes rule. And it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings. And that this power is given from God, Christ himself witnesseth, speaking to Pilate: Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold Justice that the World hath been governed from the beginning (to wit) by a Justice natural; by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephews and Families; in which government the Obedience was called natural Piety: Again, by a Justice divine, drawn from the Laws and Ordinances of God; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Justice civil, begotten by both both the former; and the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three, those of the eldest times were commanded, and that the rule in general was Paternal, it is most evident: for Adam, being Lord over his own Children, intrusted them in the service of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had been taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankind.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane society.

What other Policy was exercised, or State founded, after such time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the Flood, it cannot be certainly known, though it seem by probable conjecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the general Flood; and very likely, that the cruel Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some Tyranny in Government, or from some rougher form of Rule, than the Paternal.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those days to the Giants of Libanus, who mastered (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such times as the rule of Eldership failed, three several sorts of Government were in several times established among men, according to the divers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approved, was the Government of one, ruling by just Laws, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule; exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or observation of the Laws of God, or Men. For a lawful Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equity: and of this condition ought every Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers shall thou make therein thy Citizens: And these shall judge the people with righteous judgment.

The second Government is of divers principal Persons established by Order, and ruling by Laws, called Aristocracy; or Optimacy; to which Oligarchy (or the particular faction and incorporation of a few great ones) is opposed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democracy, to which is opposed Ochlocracy, or the turbulent unjust ruling of the confused multitude, sedulously swaying the State, contrary to their own Laws and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly expressed by Tholofanus: unius, paucorum, & multorum; Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of Policy since the second increase of mankind, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family, gave Laws to his own issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplied into many households (man by nature loving society) joynted their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vici; of the Greeks κωμ; which signifies a House; or of the word (Vici) because it hath divers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first Houle grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus (being a society of divers Villages) so called of the Greeks μῆν which signifieth a Fountain: because many people (having their habitations not far a-funder) drank of one Spring or Stream of Water: To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires, answereth not unfly.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride, between the Race of the one and the other, daily increased: so both to defend themselves from out-rage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to join and set together divers of their Villages, environing them first with Banks and Ditches, and afterwards with Walls: which, being so compassed, were then called oppidas; either ab opponendo seclibibus, because walls were opposed against Enemies; or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence: as also they were called Urbes, ab orbe; because when they were to build a City, they made a Circle: with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose, or fortify. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was antiently in this; that Urbs signified no other than the very walls and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that ab eo quod multitudo civis, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these walls are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the City,

City, may by turns become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest go under the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same general name of Subjects are also known. For every Citizen is a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chief Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we need not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Adverb Magis (as also Magisteria, Preceps of Art) or else from the Greek word (Magistos) and so the Greeks call them Magistrates, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The Office and Duty of every Magistrate, Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equity; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresseth both the cause efficient, and final, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their Duties and Office. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou do evil, fear: for he beareth not the sword for naught. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He also teacheth in the same place: That every soule ought to be subject to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained, and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and fountain thereof: and shall not only be therefore subject to the judgment and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subject (saith he) not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments, upon those that have resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himself subjected themselves to the power of Magistracy: Christ commanded that all due to Caesar should be given unto him: and he payed Tribute for himself and Peter. Hieremy commanded the Israelites (even those that were Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them and for the peace of Babylon: So Abraham prayed for Abimelech, and Jacob blessed the King of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make supplications and prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous; much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostom, in his Homily to the people, prefer Monarchical Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; Beter a tyrannous King, than no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his History) sub malo principe esse, quam nullo; It is better to have a bad Prince than none at all. And bethey good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serve them: Neque enim libertas tutior illa est (saith Claudian) quam Domino servire bono; No liberty (saith he) more safe for us than to be servants to the virtuous. And certainly, howsoever it may be disputed, yet it is laffer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000 Tyrants: under a wise man that is cruel, than under the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agellus answered a Citizen of sparta, that desired an alteration of Government, That kind of rule which a man would disdain in his own house, were very unfit to govern great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erect many Cotages for their many Children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Households joyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens joyned together, and established Laws by consent, allocating themselves under one Governour, and Governments; they, so joynd, were called a Common-Wealth: the same being sometimes governed by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the People themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and Families became strong, and they dispersed into several parts of the world; was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Covetousness being as then but new, and newly grown up; these seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then fought for no larger Territory than themselves could compals and manure: they erected no other magnificent Buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest:

tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of dyet, than to maintain life: nor for any other apparel, than to cover them from the Cold, the Rain and the Sun.

And sure if we understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast upon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another (I mean to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times have brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empery (when Princes played their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience), and did then only woo men to obedience), may might be called the Golden Age; so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deservings have commonly the least impediments: and if ever Liberality overflow her banks and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policy and example. But Age and Time, do not only harden and shrink the openest and most jovial hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torn estates before their eyes, and (withal) persuadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings under the Sun whose means are answerable unto other mens desires: yet such as value all things by their own respects, do no sooner find their appetites unanswered, but they complain of alteration, and account the times injurious and Iron. And as this falleth in the Reign of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his daies be many: for our younger years are our Golden Age; which being eaten up by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grievous alterations in our selves, and the pains and diseases which never part from us but at the grave, make the times seem to differ and displeasing: especially the quality of man's nature being also such, as it adoreth and extollet the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how just soever: Est humanæ malignitatis vitio, ut semper veterem laudem præsentia in fastidio sint; It converteth praise (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignity, that we almost extol the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errors of wayward Age: quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praisers of fore-past times, forgetting this advice of

Solomon: Say not then, why is it that the former daies were better than these? For thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca; Majora nostri quæstunt, & nos querimus; posterius queruntur, everjos esse mores, regere nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omnia defualabi: Our ancestors have complained, we do complain, our Children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickedness doth reign, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into alleuil. These are usually the Discourses of Age and Misfortune. But hereof what can we add to this of Arnobius? Nova res lib. 2. quædamque vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus; quandoque vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus; quibus caput nova fuit & repentina. Whatsoever is new, in time shall be made old: and the antientest things when they took beginning were also new and oldain. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentment of present times have made Golden, this we may set down for certain, That as it was the virtue of the first Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns: the love of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crowns on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes: so (relatively) he gave the care and justice of Kings to the Subjects; having respect, not only to the Kings themselves, but even to the meanness of his Creatures: Nunquam particulari bono servit omne visus, & bonum; The infinite goodness of God doth not attend any one only: for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a general love it is, that Princes hold a general obedience: For, Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vain want thereof without virtue.

And with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authority, began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave place, trust, and power. From which employments and Offices sprang those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age, to which we Nobility, or difference these daies. But this Nobility, or difference given to the Succession of Blood, but to Succession of Virtue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were advanced, to be known for the Sons of such Fathers; and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, upon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in virtue, were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute pre aliis notabilis. But after such time as the deferred Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, Saint Jerom judged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; Iste no other thing to be affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kind of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the virtue of their Ancestors. For if Nobility be Virtus & antique divitie; Virtue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, do no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vivor) be a witness of virtue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of Virtue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Virtue is extinguished, but like unto Painted and Printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men in whom there remain but the dregs and Vices of ancient Virtue: Flowers, and Herbs, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled? Ex terra fertilis producitur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, ex terra sterili pretiosum Aurum: Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometimes poisoning Herbane, and out of barren soyle precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobility) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Virtue, and Quality, profitable to the Common-weal. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Virtue, serving his Prince and Country, and being defended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobility, which the same Author calleth personal (the same which our selves acquire by our Virtue and well doings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both natural by Descent, and also

Personal; yet if Virtue be wanting to the natural, then is the personal and acquired Nobility, by many degrees, to be preferred: For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light upon such a one, as in his own nature is a true Villain. There is also a third Nobility, which he calleth Nobility in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour: and these be indeed but Honours of affectation, which Kings, with the change of their Fancies, with they knew well how to wipe off again. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthiness, as we have of vanity in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobility (without Virtue) to be shame and dishonour, than Nobleness and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is born in sin, of a Potshere body and barren mind? For (according to the same Father) Dele fucum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronate vitorem gloria, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou mayest consider thy self nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Myrrour, or glittering with Jewels, or garnished with Silke, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration, as certain morning clouds, which do or will soon pass over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping, because he is born, and repining, because he is born to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference between it and dust: which if thou dost not believe (saith St. Chrysostom) look into the Sepulchres and Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily persuade thee by their own example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seem more noble and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diversity of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creator.

For true Nobility standeth in the Trade Of virtuous life; not in the fleshy Line: For blood is brute, but Gentry is Divine.

And howsoever the custom of the World have made it good, that Honours be cast by birth upon unworthy Issues: yet Solomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his fellow-Princes: There is an evil (saith he) that I have seen under the Sun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth: Folly is set in great excellency.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like a Sovereign Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have been of just authority.

THE first of all that reigned as Sovereign Lord, after the Flood, was Nimrod; the Son of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to S. Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminency, and because he was the first of fame, and took on him to command others: or else, in that he was begotten by Chush; after is other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time than some of his Grand-children and Nephews. Howsoever, seeing Moses in express words, calleth Nimrod the Son of Chush, other men conjectures to the contrary, ought to have no respect.

This Empery of Nimrod, both the Fathers, and many later Writers call tyrannical: the same beginning in Babel (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to me, that Aelian hath conceived not amiss hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Author of that Work, called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator: A bitter, or severe Governor, because his form of Rule seemed, at first, far more terrible than Paternal authority. And therefore is he in this respect also called A mighty Hunter: because he took and destroyed both beasts and thieves. But S. Augustine understands it otherwise, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligendus est Giges ille, Venator contra Dominum; Sive that Giants to be understood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoever this word (A mighty Hunter) be understood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those which went with him from the East into Shinar: so, this charge was rather given him, than by him usurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himself, or any of the Sons of his own body, came with this troop into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the years of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this disobedient troop, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by divers Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Jochan, were the Captains and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himself so far as Shinar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Son's Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrews (according to the general opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the Southernmost parts of Chaldaea, about the City of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldaea, were no partners in the unbelieving work of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia Heber remansit hac lingua; In the family of Heber this language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius); and this Language Abraham used; yes, it was anciently, and before the Flood, the general speech: and therefore first called (saith Cassiodorus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Aegyptius Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chief Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely, but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just authority, than violence of usurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct Persons.

Benzo, and out of him Naclerus; with others, make many Nimrods; Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierom upon Ose; and these words of Saint Augustine seem to make him of the same Opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Bel, qui primus illic regnaverat 65. annos; There did Ninus reign after the death of his father Belus, who governed in Babylon sixty five years. But it could not be unknown to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Moses being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom (saith he) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly, it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod; as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus's time, the World was marvellously replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authours. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat; Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Caesar overthrew the liberty of the Roman Commonwealth, making himself perpetual Dictator; yet Augustus was the first established Emperour, and the first that reigned absolutely by sovereign Authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of sovereign rule, as Caesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with general allowance, exercised such a power. Terentius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them, both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. years after the Flood (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proves it not. For, so Edward the third, and his Grand-child, Richard the second, were Kings both in one year: the one died; the other in the same year was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For, it is plain, that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoining: but the first, and most famous work of Ninus, was the City of Ninive.

Now, whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppresseth the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one Person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Affria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis's time.

—Dicitur akam

Semiramis with walls of Brick, the City did inclose.

Further, where it is alleged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty; so Justine hath the fame of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's Arguments; it may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings as well. For, if we may believe Justine; then were Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanis of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them.

For, whereas Mercator conceiveth, that it was too early, for any that lived about the time of the confusion of Languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one Person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true. That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them, and built them from the ground, being the first after the Flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts; and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hand.

Besides, whereas these Cities, in many mens opinions, are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Accad, which the Septuagint calls Archard; and Epiphanius, Arphal; Junius takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia; for for the Region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accadene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Ninive, to be one City: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran, are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia; the same which Ariar Montanus, out of S. Hierom, calls Achad; and so do the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erech, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg; and Pagninus, Erec; this place Junius understands for Aracca in Susiana; but there is also a City in Camagena, called Aracc; and indeed, likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalne) some take it for Calinis: of which Am. Mercellinus, S. Hierom takes it for Seleucia; Hieronymianus, for Ctesiphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this Dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diverse and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne in the Land of Shinaar: so as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldaea (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think, with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities far removed, and in several Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Go you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence go you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistines. The Geneva Translation, favouring the former Opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar were here named, not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chalde, from Babylon in Egypt: but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire, there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now, that Chalne is situate in the valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradyse. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Affur, built Ninive; and that it is probable, out of Elay 23. 13. that Affur built Uk of the Chaldees.

Now, as of Nimrod; so are the Opinions of Writers different touching Affur, and touching the beginning of that great State of Babylon and Affria: a controversy wearisomely disputed without any direct proof, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the Interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who, besides all necessary consequence, doth not disjoin the fence of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium Regni ejus Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalne, in terra Shinaar: i. terra hac processit in Affyriam, ubi edificavit Niniven (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this Land into Affria, and built Ninive. So as Junius takes Affur in this place, not for any Person, but for the Region of Affria; the Land being so called in Moses's time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction (where the word Affur is taken for Affur the Son of Shem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth throughout all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For, in the beginning of the tenth Chapter, he setteth down the Sons of Noah, in these words: Now these are the generations of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom Sons were born after the Flood: then it followeth immediately; The Sons of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's Sons, be he eldest or youngest, because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets down his Issue, and then the Issue of his Sons: first, the Issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest Son; and then speaks of Javan and his Sons: for of the rest of that Family he is silent. Anon after, he numbereth the Sons of Ham, of which Chus was the eldest; and then the Sons of Chus and Mizraim; and afterwards of Canaan; leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disjoin the Story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, unto unto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the Son of Shem, in the middle of the Generations of Ham, had been against order; neither would Moses have past over so slightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire in one of the Sons of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the Story of Shem's Sons which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the Sons of Chus, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter, he returns to speak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the Issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Isaac. And of Junius opinion touching Assur, was Calvin: to which I conceive P. Comestor, in his Historia Scholastica, gave an entrance, who after he had delivered this place in some other sense, he useth these words: Vel intelligendum non est de Assur, filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est, Regnum Assyriorum) inde egresum est, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abrahami factum est (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of Assur the Son of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdom of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great Grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the difference in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad Regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the Son of Nimrod: and so doth Methadius, and Viterbiensis, Saint Hieron, and Cyrillus, and now lastly, Tormellus: who (saith he) took upon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his Conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Isa. 81. Esay 10. Ose. 5. &c. But to help the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the Son of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Archbishop of Aleutis in the year of Christ 854. an ancient and Learned Writer, understands this place with Comestor, or Comestor with him, agreeing in substance with that Translation of Junius: to which words of Moses he giveth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Ninus, Beli filii, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this Land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great City, so named of Ninus the Son of Belus. On the contrary, Calvin objecteth this place of Esay: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this was no People, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderness; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diversity in the Translation and Understanding; inasmuch as Michael de Palatio upon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it over. But Calvin seemeth hereby to infer, that because Assur founded the State of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur, rather than Nimrod, established the Assyrian Empire, and built Nineve: contrary to the former translation of Junius, and to his own Opinion. Now, out of the Vulgar (called Hierom's Translation) it may be gathered, that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or City of the Chaldeans; by Esay remembered: unto which City, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians, that they cannot trust or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this City of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example unto those Phenicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruin: which City of Chaldea, being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and fore-telleth them, that their own City of Tyre (invincible, as themselves thought) should also soon after be overturned by the same Assyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nebuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierom: Ecce terra Chaldeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundavit eam, in captivitatem tradiderunt robustos ejus, fissiderunt domos ejus, posuerunt eam in ruinam (which is) Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a People there were not (or, this was no People, after the Geneva) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captives, they undermined their Houses, and ruined their City. The Septuagint express it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et interra Chaldeorum, &c. hec desolata est ab Assyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding verse, which altogether may be thus understood: If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedon, or Greece) yet

Gen. 10.

yet thou shalt not rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Isidorus convert it thus: Ecce terra Chaddim, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundavit eam, robustos ejus, creverunt arces illius; contriverunt ades ejus, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this People was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for Ships, they erected the Towers thereof; and again brake down the houses thereof, and ruined it. Junius, in the place of Ships, sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted, that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those places, Cities, and Regions, by whose trade the state and greatness of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharjis, from the Macedonians, and other Grecians, under the name of Chittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our Discourse of Paradise) not the least part of their chief merchandize came in by the City Uz, or Ureboe in Chaldea, where the body or chief stream of Euphrates (even that stream which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tygris) had his passage into the Persian Gulf: though now it be stopped up. For, as we have heretofore noted, the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the East banks of the Persian Gulf, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charan, and Chalde did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tygris, that is, from Teredon; and of Euphrates, that is, from Uz, or Ureboe: and then by Babylon, and thence by River and over Land, they conveyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they do this day to Aleppo. So then Uz of the Chaldees was a Port Town, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, trade, and exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stoppt up. Ejus cursus vestitus abolevit (saith Niger.) And Pliny: Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum; Time hath worn away the channel of Euphrates: the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the City of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the City anciently called Uz; and by Hecataeus, Camerinus; by Ptolemy, Ureboe; and by the Greeks, Chaldecopolis, the City of Chaldea: which the Sons of Shem, until Abraham's time, inhabited. And whereas, in all the Translations, it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Assur the Founder was the Son of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Uz of Chaldea, were at length oppressed: and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-seeing, commanded Abraham thence to Curran, and to Isidoro Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Barabans and Pagninus converted (by Ships) do bear that sense, the same may be the better approved, because it was a Port Town: and the River so far up as this City of Uz was in ancient time navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no less manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next People of all other unto it. For Chaldea is now called Arachaldar, which signifieth Desert Land, because it joincth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Tureans) addeth, that they are, of all other People, the most Salvage; calling them, Homines omnium maximè barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary Opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former Translation of Junius, nor the Interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Assur is in this place diversely taken (as for the Son of Shem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Uz; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seem to enforce it. And so this Founding of the City of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the Posterity of Shem that came into Shinar, and were separate for the Idolatry of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove the same Assur built Nineve, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the Son of Shem, both an Idolater, and the Son of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set a Statue or Image to be honoured as God. Now, if Assur must be of that Race, Race, and not of the Family of Shem, as he must be, if he founded Ninive, then all those which seek to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thousand parts more injury, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur, whom they make the Founder of Ninive (and so the Son of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly, he was very unworthy, and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire, and such a City, if no man have vouchsafed to leave to Posterity his ex-pulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire again, or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) far differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the Story of that Age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne, the first works and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these works being finished within the Valley of Shinar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the work of Ninus, lying near unto the same stream that Babel and Chalne did: which work his Grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to pass, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundress of the City which she onely finished: so also Ninus of Ninive: Quam quidam Babylonem potuit instaurare; she might repair or renew Babylon, saith Augustine. For so did Nebuchodonosor vaunt himself to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built up again some part of the wall, over-born by the fury of the River: which work of his stood till Alexander's time, whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I have built?

§. IV.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

BUT to return to the Story, it is plain in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfiguring, and Julius Africanus (surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the the Babylonian Monarchy, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those four Cities before remembred; Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne; and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Affria, and in Affria built four more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rebbooth, Calah, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel itself, and those adjoining; and that his travels were many ere he came into Shinar: that work of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninive, and the other Cities of Affria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his Successors in many years after: to whose undertakings time had given so great an increase of People; and the examples and patterns of his beginning, so great advancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Ateraper, a sermonis linguarum terraque drossione. By reason that the earth and the speech were then divided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114 years; of whose acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firm ground of all those great Fens and overflowen Marishes which adjoined unto it. For any of his Wars or Conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatus King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia, which Berosus calls Scythia Saga, whose Son and Successor Barzanes became subject and Tributary to Ninus, that followed the War to effect; which was by his Father Belus begun.

§. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

THAT so many Kingdoms were erected in all those Eastern parts of the World so soon after Nimrod (as by the Story of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunity, Example, and Necessity. For Opportunity, being a Prince's liberal and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wisdom ought; by whose presence alone the understanding minds of men receive all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troop (after the division of Tongues, and dispersion of People) finding these fair offers made unto them, held the power which they possess, and and governed by discretion all those People, whom they conducted to their designed places. For, it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first divided, mankind straggled abroad like Beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves; and undertook to inhabit all the known parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions, from Babylon and Shinar, which had Kings, and were Peopled in Ninus his time, would not have been possessed in many hundreds of years after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and travelled far off (order being the true Parent of prosperous success) undertake so difficult enterprises without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the example of Nimrod, with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessity resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their own Travels; nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence; nor those which sought after any proportion of greatness, either possess the same in quiet, or rule and order their own Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the undertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the Son of Belus) made it apparent; for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, what way soever his Ambition led him in the Wars.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to us known, when he first took on him Sovereignty and sole commandment of all those the Children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life-time others also raised themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his Son and Successor) found Sabatus King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts, which Sabatus I take to be the same, which Justine calls Tanais; and should conjecture, that Mitrain had been his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error (as Justine placeth him) in the time that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seems to me, rightly accounted by the Judicious and Learned Reineccius, all one with the great Sesysiris, that lived certain Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65 years, according to the common account.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affixed unto it.

WHENCE this second King and Successor, of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath been made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himself.

Cyillus again (saith Julian) calls the Father of Ninus, Belus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himself to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence derived. But Bel, as many Writers have observed, signifieth the Sun in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldean Princes and Babylonian Ateraper: so was it used (in imitation) by the chief of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) those voices of Baal, Baalim, Belphégor, Belphagor, Belshub, and Beelshub. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean, convert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps militie, Chief in the War; though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum; In honor of his expounding secrets. Saint Hieronym makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the same signification: and saith, that the Idol of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memory of his Father set up to be worshipped: to which, that he might add the more honour and reverence, he made it a Sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Zy-sion) came Idolatry, and the first use of Images into the World. Isidore doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old, or ancient; adding, that as among the Affrians it is taken for Saturn, and the Sun: so, in the Tanick or Carthaginian Language, it signifieth God: Glycas makes it an Affrian name properly; and Josephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth, that the Idol which the Atholites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountain Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Prinipus, the god of Gardens; which also was the Opinion of Saint Hieronym. But, that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say, as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idol of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel foundeth (God) and Sebub (Flies

(Flies or Hornets) by which name (notwithstanding) the Jews express the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Isaiah teacheth us the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himself; And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ithi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For, although the name of Baal, or Babai, be justly to be used towards God; yet in respect that the fame was given to Idols, God hath hated it, and forbad it: And the using of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sun, was not, because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sun there was worshipped as God: as also the Fire was; tantum Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembered) as Belphegor, and Belphephon; Belphephon is expounded out of Facies, Dominus speculae, vel custodia: The Lord of the Watch-tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idol, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is written Belpheor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Demidavit; and therefore the word joined, expresth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the Son of Saturn: for it was used among the Ancients, to name the Father Saturn, the Son Jupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturni dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regumque qui urbes considerunt sensissim; primogeniti eorum Joves & Junones, Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortissim. The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings; which founded Cities, are called Saturni; their first-born, Jupiters and Juno; their valiant Nephews, Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Vives) was famous by reason of his Warlike Son, Ninus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (transported by Dreams of their Antiquities) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) upon Lybia the Daughter of Ephaphras, begat this Jupiter Belus, who was Father to Aegyptus. They add, that this Belus, carrying a Colony to the River of Euphrates, there built a City, in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But, were there any Belus the Son of Ephaphras and Isis, or of Neptune and Lybia, or (with Eusebius) of Teglonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis (Cecrops then reigning in Athen) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speak, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonians Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the Inventor of Astronomy, if Pliny say true; from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth, that it did remain in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writteth thus: Over the River, saith he, there are Gardens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tomb, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of Brick, a furlong high, and on every side it had a furlong in breadth. It appears by Cyril against Julian, that he obtained divine worship yet living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus.) Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur a subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: Perseveravit igitur Assyrii, & finitima illis gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their subjects with title of Deity; (or with the name of God) the Assyrians therefore, and the bordering Nations have persecuted, sacrificing to him. Even Arius also, whom Suidas calls Therax, who succeeded next after Ninus, was made an Idol-God among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninias) Thuras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharp and fierce disposition, who bidding battle to Caucasus, of the flock of Japheth, slew him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars, thus far Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that any among Idolatrous Nations were Deified in their life-times, or soon after: though I deny not, but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without divine worship, onely in memory of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth and so afterward the Devil crept into those wooden and brazen carcases, when Posterity had lost the memory of their first invention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos affirmant, homines fuerunt, & pro virtutibusque vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, aut apud suos post mortem ceperunt: sed (Demonibus persuadentibus) quos illi pro sua memoria honoraverunt, minores Deos existimant: ad ista vero magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum fimenta;

They

They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence, began after his death to be honoured of his own: Lat, at length (the Devils persuading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more persistent.

And, that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregory: Gentilitas (saith he) inventrix & caput est Imaginum; Gentilism is the inventress and ground of Images: and Ambrose: Gentes legum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore roods, as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of images a custom borrowed of the Heathen. The like saith S. Augustine against Adimantus. Et venterur (saith Augustinus) ne Religio vana sit, si nihil videtur aut quod adorant; They fear their Religion would be vain, should they not see what they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Scholemn shift this fearful custom very strangely. For, seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfy it self with the distinction of Dionis, and Hyperdionis, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should strain their wits to defend the use of those things, which the Scriptures have not only no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practitioners thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Devil was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither express the Commandment of God himself, Thou shalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatening of Moses and the Prophets after him, could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any persuasions lead the hearts of men from it. For, where shall we find words of greater weight, or plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb, out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selves, and make you a graven Image, or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And, besides the express Commandment, Thou shalt make thee no graven Image, and the prohibition of many Scriptures; so it is written in the Book of Wisdom, That the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredom: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Scholemn affirm, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest, that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal, and the rest of that nature. For ye saw no Image (saith Moses) thou day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Baali; Noli aliquam in illam formam imaginari, ne circumferas cum mentis tua: Do not imagine any form to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy mind. Now, if the great Baali thought it a presumption unlawful to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how far do those men presume, that put him under the graphic Pencil of a Painter, or the rusty Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Carver?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God, began in Babel: so did the Devil transport and spread this invention into all the Regions adjoining, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans, for a while, resisted the creation of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170 years; observing the Law of Numa, who thought it impious to resemble things most beautifully, by piety to make false. But, Tarquinius Priscus at length most boldly, and following the vanterwards prevailing, and following the authority of the Grecians (a Nation of all others under the Sun most deluded by Satan) set up the Images of their gods, which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which since thus derideth; Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicat, genua posito illa adorant, & cum hæc supplicat, fabros, qui illa fecere, contemunt: The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray unto, with bended knees they adore; and while they so greatly admire them, they contemn the Handicraftsmen that made them: which also sedulity the Poet in this sort scotteth at:

Hæc miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro Religiosa sibi sculptunt simulachra, summeque Factorem fugiunt, & que fecere, venterur! Quis furor est? que tanta animos dementia ludit?
Ut volucrum, turpesque bovem, torcumque Draconem, Sceni hominemque canem supplex homo promus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities, And consecrate dumb Idols in their heart, Who their own Maker (God on high) despise, And fear the work of their own hands & art!

V

What

What fury? what great madnels doth bequile
Mens minds? that man should ugly shapcs adore
Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile Half-dog-half-man on knees for aid impire.

And though this device was barbarous, and first, and many years practised by Heathen Nations onely, till the Jews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugh-eth to scorn the ignorant stupidity of his Nation: but Justin Martyr remembreth how the Sybls inveighed against Images: and Hospinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the souls of men to erect and adore those bables. Strabo and Herodotus witness, that the Perfians did not erect or set up any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus never taught it the Lacedemonians, but thought it impiety to represent immortal natures by mortal Figures. Ensebius also witnesseth, in his Sixth Book, de preparatione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brackmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same do Cicero and Cristianus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authours might be remembred, that witness the disdain which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatry: of which Hospianian hath written at large in his Treatise, de origine imaginum. And it was truly said,
Omnia mala exempla bonis imitris orta sunt.
All ill examples have sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen, at first, made these Statue and Images, but in memory of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries and common-wealths: Effigies hominum (saith Pliny) non solum exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa percontitatem merentium.
Men are not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembred. And though of the more ancient Papists, some have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Laëtantius) that defence for Images: That Stimulachra are prolementis literarum, ut per ea different homines.
Deum invisibilem cognoscere: Images say they,
(and so be fore them the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the invisible God: in which understanding, perhaps, they no otherwise esteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Ba-al, or Bel, set up in memory of Belus the Babyllonian, became afterward the most reverend Idol of the world, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himself) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks and stones, and painted canvases (called the pictures of Christ, our Lord, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but esteemed to have life, motion, and understanding. On these stocks we call (saith the Look of Wisdom) when we pass through the raging waves, on these stocks, more rotten than the ship that carries us.

This Heathen invention of Images became so fruitful in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders;
as Dii cœlestes, seu majorum gentium, selecti, Patritii, inferiores, dii medi: Consulting gods, or gods of the mightiest Nobility, select gods, Patritii, gods of mark, and Common gods (which the Romans called Mædioxum) dii infimi, and terrestrial Heroes, and multitudes of other gods, of which S. Augustine hath made large mention, in his Book, de Civitate Dei. But (saith Laëtantius) among all those miserable souls, and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknown God, which stood with the same title and dedication, even to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Devil had so many years led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was so great in general, or that every Nation had some one which took particular and singular care of them, as Jupiter in Crete, Isis in Egypt, in Athen, Minerva, in Samos, Juno, in Paphos, Venus, and so of all other parts; but every City, and almost every Family, had a god apart. For, as it is written in the second of Kings, the men of Ebel made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Aphima, and the Avites made Nibhaz and Tarhak, and the Sepharaims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which, how plainly hath the Prophet Esaie derided? Men cut down Trees, rind them, burn a part of them, make ready their meat, and warm themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god: an Idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their heart from understanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian, to believe the Commandments of God, to direct against Idolatry, to believe the Prophets, and to believe S. Paul, who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flee from Idolatry: I speak as unto them which have understanding, judge ye what I say.

of the Wars of Ninus: and lastly, of his War against Zoroaster.

UNTO this Belus succeeded Ninus; the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatry, the first that injuriously invaded his Neighbour Princes, and the first that, without shame or fear, committed Adultery in publick. But, as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars) so of this Ninus (whose Story is gathered out of profane Authors) I find nothing so warrantable, but that the fame may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For, although that piece of Berosus, set out and commented upon by Annianus, hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (as Chryseus noteth) to the understanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnassensis, and others: yet, Lodo-vicus Vivæ, B. Rhenanus, and others after them, have laid open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; proving directly, that it cannot be the same Berosus which lived in Alexander's time, cited by Athenæus and Josephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, even from Nimrod, to the eighteenth King Asatades, and to the times of Josua. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certain Papers; or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards, in the collection of the Persian Kings, is not without his errors.

Ctesias, or Cnidus (a City joining to Halicarnassus) who lived together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his History out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as far upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and, though in the Story of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approveth him in some things, and Athenæus, Pausanias, and Terullian cite him; yet to bale and apparent are his flatteries of the Times and Princes with whom he lived, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoever his reports were, times have consumed his Works, saving some very few exceptions lately published.

And therefore in things uncertain, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of judgment, I will pass over the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as can express them. S. Augustine affirms; that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wan it all, save India, Esdria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia, the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entered into a freight league of amity, because he commanded many people, and was his kinsman, and a Chusite, and the nearest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was upon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because he invaded it on the sudden, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barnanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his War against Zoroaster: for from Armenia, he bent himself, that way toward the East;
but, that, ever he commanded the lesser Asia,
I do not believe, for none of his Successors had any possession therein.

His third War was against Tharnes, King of the Medes, whom it is said that he overthrew, and cruelly murdered with his seven Children; though others affirm, that they all died in one battle against him. Whether he invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is uncertain. It is said, that he made two Expeditions into Bactria: and, that finding little or ill success in the first, he returned, and let the work of Ninive forward: and then a second time entered Bactria with 1700000 Foot, and 20000 Horse, and 100000 fix hundred Chariots: being encountered by Zoroaster with four hundred thousand. But Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaster being slain, he entered farther into the Countrey, and besieged the chief City thereof, called Bactra, or Badrian (saith Stephanns) which by a passage found, and an assault given by Semiramis (the Wife of Menon) he entered and possessed. Upon this occasion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her person and external beauty, fancied her to strongly, as neglecting all Princely respects) he took her from her Husband, whose eyes he threatened to thrust out, if he refused to consent. He therefore yielding to the passion of love in Ninus, and to the passion of fellow in himself, by the strong persuasions of shame and dishonour, cast himself headlong into the Water, and died.

What fury? what great maduels doth beguile
Mens minds? that man should ugly shapes

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief Authour of Magick Arts: and of the divers kinds of Magick.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first inventor of Astrologie, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

Zoroaster, King of the Bactrians, Vincensius supposeth to be Cham the Son of Noah: a fancy of little probability. For Cham was the Paternal Ancestour of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose Son was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincensius had heard of that Book which was called Scriptura Cham, devised by some wicked Knave, and so entialed; of which Sixtus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of Magick to Cham the Son of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholastical History; which Art (saith he) with the seven Liberal Sciences he writ in fourteen Pillars: seven of which were made of Brasse, to resist the defacing by the Waters of the Flood; and seven of Brick, against the injury of fire. There was also another devised Discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like this of Comestor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & sacrilegis suis arribus infusus, sciens nullum se posse super his memorialem librum in Arcam proferre inferre, in qua erat cum patre suo, &c. Cham the Magician: which is also the opinion of (the Son of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any Book or memorial of that nature into the Ark, wherein he was to remain with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in Metal, and hard Stone.

Saint Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his birth, when all other children weep; which prefiged the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto; being taken for the Inventor of natural Magick, and other Arts; for the Corrupter, saith Pliny and Justine. But I do not think that Zoroaster invented the doctrine of the Horoscopes, or Nativities: or first found out the nature of Herbs, Stones, and

Minerals, or their Sympathetical, or Antipathetical workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldea is also made the Inventor. I rather think that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his Sons. For Abraham, who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster (as Josephus reporteth) was no less learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdom of after-times in this, that he knew, and acknowledged, the true cause, and giver of life and virtue to Nature, and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and universal power) admired the Instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdom, Which be- ing one, and remaining in it self, can do all things, and reneweth all.

Now, whether this Zoroaster (overthrown by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Pliny finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authours report, then Zoroaster, slain by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Again, Josephus, and Cedrenus affirm, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Stars, and other motions of the Heavens: for if this Art had been invented by Zoroaster, he could not have attained to any such excellency therein, in his own life-time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular judgment, he might add somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to Posterity.

But of this Zoroaster, there is much dispute: and no less jangling about the word and Art of Magick. Arnobius remembereth four, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was given: which by Hermodorus and Dion seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and and was as much to say, as Astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus overthrew: the second, a Chaldean, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylus, who lived in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hofstanes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus, there past threecore and eighteen years. Suidas remembereth a fifth, called Persemedus Sarmatians: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the Son of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now, of what Nation the first and chief Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Pliny and Lactantius make him a Persian. Gemistheus, or Pletho, Ficinus and Stenchius, make him a Chaldean. But by those Books of one Zoroaster found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often given to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishing of Nations. Forphyrus makes the Chaldees and Magi divers; Picus, the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Books, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldean Tongue; and the Comment in the same Language. Now, that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of those Books of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastris & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia; and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

Now, for Magick it self; which Art (saith Mirandula) *Pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few understand, and many reprehend; Et scilicet Canes ignotos semper allatrant; As Dogs bark at those they know not: so they condemn and hate the things they understand not: I think it not amiss (leaving Ninus for a while) to speak somewhat thereof.*

It is true, that many men abhor the very name and word (Magus) because of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but goes (that is) familiar with evil Spirits, usurped that Title. For Magick, Conjuring, and Witchery, are far differing Arts, whereof Pliny being ignorant, scoffeth thereat. For Nero (saith Pliny) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East, sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdom by his grace, found the Art, after long study and labour, altogether ridiculous.

Magus is a Persian word primitively, where- by is exprest such a one as is altogether conversant in things Divine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magick is the Art of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the words (magus) saith, that the Persians called their gods magus: whence he addeth, that Magus is either a magus quoniam deus, or magus quoniam deus (that is) that Magus is a name sometimes of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the service of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Mat. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kind: which Piccolominie calleth divine Magick; and these did the Latine new-ly entitle Scientes, or Wisemen: For the fear and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisemen the Greeks call Philosophers: the Indians, Branchmans; which name they somewhat neerly retain to this day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Egyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrews they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differentiated by the name of Chaldees; and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hofstanes, one of the ancient Magicians) useth these words: *Et verum Deum merita majestate persequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed veri ejus venerationi novit assidere. Idem demonia prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos: Softener (for so M. Felix called him, not Hofstanes) ascribeth the due Majesty to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the Worship of the true God. He also hath delivered that there are Devils earthly, and wandering, and enemies to man-kind.*

His Majesty also, in his first Book of Demonologie, ch. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian Tongue the word (Magus) imports as much a contemplator of divine and heavenly science; but unjustly so called, because the Chaldees were ignorant of the true Divinity. And it is also right which His Majesty avoweth, that under the name of Magick, all other unlawful Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Majesty distinguish it from Necromancy, Witchcraft, and the rest: of which he hath written largely, and most learnedly. For the Magick which His Majesty condemneth, is of that kind whereof the Devil is a party. Daniel in his second Chapter nameth four kinds of those Wisemen: Ariohs, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldei. Arioli the old Latine Translation calleth Sophistas; Fatalis and Paginnus, Conethiacos, or Physicos, or philosophers.

Philosophers, or (according to the note of i. tabular) Naturalists: Nempe sunt Magi apud Favaros, quod Philosophi apud Grecos (scilicet) divinarum humanarumque rerum scientiam profiteres; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Grecians (that is) men that profess the knowledge of things both divine and humane. The Greek and the English call them Inchanters; Junius, Magicians; Castellan, Conjurers; in the Syrian, they are all four by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The Wisemen of Babel.

The second sort Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our Engliſh, call Aſtrolegers; Hicrom and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici or Venefici; in Hierom, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poisoners: in Junius, Præstigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in Engelſb.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poisoners; and that indeed there is a kind of Malefice, which, without any Art of Magic or Necromancie, use the help of the Devil to do mischief. His Majesty confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Book: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mix the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Devil prepared; and at other times to make Pictures of Wax, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were sacramentaliter) to effect those things which the Devil by other means bringeth to pass.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldeans: who took upon them to foretell all things to come, as well natural as humane, and their events: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Stars, by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are, the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of Magick, having chiefly sought (as is the manner of all Impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they have also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kind of Magick, was that part of Astrologic, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of Agriculture and Husbandry: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Stars into those lower Elements.

Philo Judeus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick, or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starrs, and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldaea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem (saith Jo. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Josephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetick and Astronomie, who before Abraham's coming unto them knew none of these Sciences.

And so doth Archangelus de Buzge, in defence of Mirandula against Garfias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium prestantissimus, Chaldeos & primum, deinde Phoenices, demum Egyptios Sacerdotes Astrologos & divinos docuerit: Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirm that Abraham, the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldeans, then the Phenicians; lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie, and divine Knowledge.

The third kind of Magick containeth the whole Philosophy of Nature; not the Brabbings of the Aristoteliens, but that which bringeth to light the inmost virtues, and draweth them out of Nature's hidden bottom to humane use: Virritutes in centro centratis; Latentes; Virtutes hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chyzziffs. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa nova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these, in elder-times, and who better understood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that work to things that suffer: were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus, remembered by S. Hierom to Pamphilus; in some mens Opinion, Numa Pompilius, among the Romans: among the Indians, The Iffian: among the Egyptians, Hermes: among the Babylonians, Budda: the Theracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris: and the Italians, Petrus Aponeffis. The Magick, which these men profest, is thus defined: Magia est conexio a viro sapiente agnientum per naturam cum patientibus, his congruenter respondentibus, ut inde opera praeant, non sine curiosis sine admiratione qui causam ignorant: Magick is the connexion of natural agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man, to the bringing forth of such effects: as are wonderful to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds, which other men divide into four, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned; especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesteth God to be the Creator of the Universal: he believeth of the  Trinity*, which he could not investigate by an natural knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: he approveth the immortality of the Soul: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discouraging of the Abstinence and Charity of the Magi: which Oracles of his Fellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others, have gathered and translated.

Of

Of this Zoroaster, Euseb. in the Theologie of the pharizians, using Zoroaster's own words: Hac ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus in corruptibilibus, sempiternus, ingenuus, expe-ritum, sibi ipsi simillimus, honorum omnium aurea, munera non expedit, optimus, prudentissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina iustitiam pre-doctus, naturæ perfectus, sapiens, sacre natu-ræ inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. God, the first incorruptible, ever lasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himself, the guide of all good, expelling no reward the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learned justice without teaching, perfect wife because the only inventor thereof.

Sixtus Senefils, speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldeans, doth distinguish those wise men into five orders (to wit) Chafedim, or Chaldeans : Asaphim, or Magicians : Charunim (which he translates Ariolic, or Sophists) : Mechaphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Wiches, or Poisoners ; and Gazarim, Augures, or Arnsprices or Dignifiers.

Chaldeans were those which had the name of Chaldeans, which were Astronomers: Hælorum motus diligentissime spectarunt; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heavens: whom Philo, in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers : of the Septuagint, and of Hierom, Magicians : Qui de omnium iam divinorum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt : Who discovered of the causes of all things, as well divine as humane : of whom Origen makes Balaams (the Son of Beer) to be the first : but Laertius ascribeth the invention of this Art to Zoroastres the Perjian.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith S. Augustine, Pliny, and Iustine) of another Zoroastres : who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which he received from his Ancesters.

Mechasphem, or Venefici, or Witches, are those which we have spoken already out of His Majesties Book of Demonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after S. Hierom) which divine from the intrails of Beasts slain for sacrifices: or by Gazarim, others understand Augures, who divine by the flying, singing, or feeding of Birds.

By this distinction, we may perceive the difference between those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Perfians was most honest. For as Pencer truly observeth, Præsertim religiosi Perfice, ut in populo Dei Levitæ, studijque vere Philosphie diditi erant: nec quâquam Rex Persiarum poterat esse, qui non ante Magorum disciplinam scientiamque percepisset: The Magi (saith he) were the chief Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Levites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophy: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first been exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sextus Senensis, in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magick, his own words are these: Et neque moveant premissa Polychronio & Theophili testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam, *aliteram ubique ad Origine damnatam, quæ per sedera cum demonibus inita, aut verè, aut apparenter, operatur; aliteram ad Origine laudatam, quæ ad præcipientia philosophia pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad invocationem agentium ac patientium: That the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not move any man, it is to be understood that Magick is of two sorts, the one every where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by covincants made with devils; the other commended by Origen, which appertaineth to the practick part of natural Philosophy, teaching to work admirable things by the mutual application of natural virtues, agent and suffering reciprocally.*

This Partition Herem doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries upon Daniel, where considering of the difference which Daniel makes between these four kinds of wife Men formerly remembered, he useth this distinction: Quos non harolos; ceteri inanis (i.e. if self incantations interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Atque, qui de singulis philosophantur; Malefici, qui sanguine iuvantur; & victimis, & sepe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldeis Genetibacis significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Confutedo autem communis Magogor maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sunt Philopphi Chaldeorum: *Et ad artibus scientiam, Reges quoque & Principes ejusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate domini Salvatoris, spiritus primus ortum ejus intellexerunt; & venientes iudam Bethlehem, adoraverunt puerum, stella deiper offendeat; et Thei, whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seem to me, such as perform things by words; *Magicians, such as handle every thing philosophically; Witches, that use blond and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldeans, I take them to be signified by the name of Conjecturers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common chyloms take Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their own Nation: they they are the Philoſophers of the Chaldaans: yea, King and princes of that Nation do all that they do, according to the knowledge of this Art: at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour, they first of all understood his birth, and our, they first of all understood his birth, and coming into holy Bethlechem, did worship the Child: the Starr from above ſhewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth, that there is great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the Art. For though ſome Writers affirm, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex ſædere ſædo nitor diaboli opera ad rem quamcunque; That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who having entred league with the Devil, uſeth his help to any matter: yet (as our Saviour ſaid of Di-vorce) it was not from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wiſdom of Nature; other Arts which undergo that title, were invented by the falſhood, ſubtilty, and envie of the Devil. In the latter, there is no other doctrine, than the uſe of certain ceremonies, Per malam fidem; By an evil faith: in the former, no other ill, than the inveſtigation of thoſe virtues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work to things that ſuffer. And though by the Jews thoſe excellent Magicians, Philoſophers, and Divines, which came to worship our Saviour Chriſt, were tearmed Alchæſephim, or Mecephim; yet had they no other reaſon than common cuſtom therein. Conſuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; Common cuſtom (ſaith S. Hieron. underſtandeth Witches under the name of Magicians: And antiquity (ſaith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) underſtood good and wiſe men. Quid igitur expaveſcis Magi nomen formidoſe, novem Evangelio gratiſſum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, ſed ſapientem ſonat, & Sacerdotem? O thou ſcarſapientem ſonantem (ſaith Ficiur) why doubtſt thou to uſe the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Goſpel, which doth not ſignifie a Witch, or a Con-jurer, but a wiſe man and a Prieſt? For what brought this ſlander to that Study and Pro-feſſion, but only idle Ignorance, the Parent of cauſeleſs admiration? Cauſa fuit miſericordia quorundam operum, quæ (re vera) opera naturalia ſunt: veruntamen quia procuratioſe demonum, naturas ipſas vel conjunguntiam, vel commiſcentiam, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium ſacta ſunt, opera demoni credabantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus huiſmodi eſt Alagia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprie vocant. The marvellouſſeſt of ſome works, which (indeed) are natural, but been the cauſe of this ſlander: but becauſe theſe works have been done by procurement of devils, joining the nature together, or mingling them, or howſoever fitting the nature to their work-ing, they were thought the works of the devils by the ignorant. Among theſe works is natural Magick, which men call very improperly, Necromancy.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by underſtanding (ſaith he) the uttermoſt activity of natural agents we are aſſiſſed to know the Divinity of Chriſt: for otherwiſe (to uſe his own words) Ignoratis terminis poten-tie, & virtutis rerum naturalium, ſtat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Chriſtus, poſſe fieri per media naturalia: The terms or limits of natural power and virtue not underſtood, we muſt needs doubt, whether thoſe very works which Chriſt did, may not be done by natural means: alter which he goeth on in this fort: Ideo non hereticæ, non ſuperſtitioſe dixi, ſed verifiſſimæ & Catholicæ per talem Magiam adju-vari nos in cognoscenda divinitate Chriſti: Therefore I ſaid not heretically, non ſuperſtitioſe, ſed verifiſſimæ & Catholicæ, that by ſuch Magick we are furthered in knowing the Divinity of Chriſt. And ſeeing the Jews and others, the enemies of Chriſtian Religion, do impu-dently and impiously object, that thoſe Mi-racles which Chriſt wrought, were not above nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula, a man for this years, fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reaſon avow, that the uttermoſt of Nature's works being known, the works which Chriſt did, and which (as himſelf wit-neſſeth) no man could do, do manifeſtly teſti-fie of themſelves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely Su-preme and Divine; and thereby thoſe that were faithleſs, were either converted, or put to ſilence.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath ſought to ob-trude evil things, under the name and col-our of good things.

Seeing therefore it is confeſſed by all of underſtanding, that a Magician (accord-ing to the Perſian word) is no other than, Di-vinorum Cultor, & Interpreter: A ſtudious Obſer-voir and Expounder of Divine things: and the Art of it ſelf (I mean the Art of Natural Ma-gick) no other, Quàm naturalis Philoſophia abſoluta conſummatio: than the abſolute per-fectiſſion of natural Philoſophy. Certainly then, it proceeds from ignorance, and no way forth with with wife and learned men, promiſcuous, and without difference and diſtinction, to con-found lawfull and praiſe-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to uſe S. Paul's words) with thoſe beggerly rudiments, which the Devil hath ſhuffled, and by them bewitcheth and befoothleth graceleſs men. For if we condemn natural Magick, or the wiſdom of Nature, be-cauſe the Devil (who knows more than any man) doth alſo teach Witches and Poſſioners the harmfull parts of Herbs, Drugs, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we, by the ſame rule, condemn the Phyſician, and the Art of Healing. For the Devil alſo in the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreams, what Herbs and Drugs were proper for ſuch and ſuch Diſeaſes. Now, no man of judgment is ignorant, that the Devil from the beginning hath ſought to thruſt himſelf into the ſame em-ployment among the Miniſters and Servants of God, changing himſelf for that purpoſe into an Angel of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrin of Religion; he hath thruſt in his Prophets among thoſe of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Aſ-trologie, by giving a divine power to the Stars, teaching men to eſteem them as gods, and not as inſtruments. And (as Bunting ob-ſerveth) it is true, that judicial Aſrologie is corrupted with many ſuperſtitious: but the abuſe of the thing takes not away the Art, conſidering that heavenly bodies (as even general experience ſheweth) have, and exerciſe their operation upon the inferior. For the Sun and the Starr of Mars do drie; the Moon doth moiſten, and govern the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they have ſeveral and proper names, ſo have they ſeveral and proper virtues: the Stars do alſo differ in beauty, and in magnitude; and to all the Stars hath God given alſo their proper names, which (had they not influences and virtues different) needed not. He count-eth the number of the Stars, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celeſtial influences, the Devil caſteth not to ſhuffle in his Superſtitious: ſo to the knowledge of the ſecret virtues of Nature hath he ſtained his do-ctrine of Characters, Numbers, and Incanta-tions; and taught men to believe in the ſtrength of Words and Letters, (which, with-out Faith in God, are but Ink or common breath) thereby either to equal his own with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminiſh the glory of God's creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wife and the ſimple obſerve when the Sea-birds forſake the ſhores, and ſlie into the Land, that commonly ſome great ſtorm followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow, betoken fair weather; that the crying of Crows, and bating of Ducks, foreſhew Rain: for they feel the air moiſtened in their quils. And it is written in Hieremy the Prophet, Even the ſtork in the air knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the ſwallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Man-kind, working upon theſe as upon the reſt of Gods creatures, long time abuſed the Heathen, by teaching them to ob-ſerve the flying of Fowls, and thereby to judge of good or ill ſuccels in the Warr: and (withall) to look into their entrails for the ſame, as if God had written the ſecrets of unſearchable providence in the Livers and Bowels of Birds and Beaſts. Again, becauſe it pleaſed God ſometimes by Dreams, not only to warn and teach his Prophets and Apoſtles, but Heathen Princes alſo; as Abimelech to reſtore Sara to Abraham; becauſe he admoniſhed Joſeph, and by a Dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharaos, Solomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the Eaſt, and others. For as it is remembered in Job: In Dreams and Viſions of the night, when ſleep falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the ears, that he might cauſe man to return from his enterpriſes: therefore, I ſay, doth the Devil alſo praſtice his Divinations by dreams, or (after Pariſienſis) divinitatis imitations, his mock-divinity. This in the end grew to common, as Ariſtides compiled an Ephemerides of his own Dreams: Mitrib-dates of thoſe of his Concubines. Yea, the Ro-mans, finding the inconvenience hereof, be-cauſe all Dreams (without diſtinction of caſes) were drawn to Divination, forbade the ſame by a Law, as by the words of prohibi-tion (aut narrandis ſonantibus occultant aliquam artem divinandis) it may appear. Likewiſe by the Law of God, in Deuteronomy, Chap. 13. ſeducing Dreamers were ordered to be ſlain. Yet it is to be condemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dream for two grievous diſeaſes that oppreſt him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolemy's poiſoned wound; nor that which Saint Auguſtine reporteth of a Millanſiſe, Aug. de cura pro moriſſis a-gradis, whoſe Son (the Father dead) being de-manded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a Dream, where the Acquit-tance lay to diſcharge it: nor that of Aſſy-ages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reaſon of all which, for as much as the cauſe is not in our felices, this place denieth diſpute.

§. IV.

§. IV.

That Daniel's mistaking Nebuchodonosor's condemning of the Magicians, doth not justify all their practices.

Deut. 18.
Levit. 19.

But it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly used, were to be condemned in them, who took on them very many and strange Revelations, how came it to pass, that Daniel both condemned the haughty sentence of Nebuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldeans, and in a sort forbade it? especially considering that such kind of Oracle God himself commended to be Gain. To this several answers may be given. First, it seems that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dream of the King, which himself had forgotten, could not be known to any man by any Art, either Natural or Diabolical: For there is none other (said the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that upon good reason, that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any evil or unlawfull Arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all Daniel perverted the contrary, and called it a hasty judgment, which proceeded with fury without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniel's instruction: for himself had been taught by them, and was called chief of the Enchanters: of which some were termed Sooth-sayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi, or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel disliked and forbade the execution of that judgment, because it was unjust. For howsoever those men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawfull Arts (though not unlawfull according to the law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltless. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the King's thought, which the Devil himself could not know. So then, Daniel's dislike, and hindring of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

Notwithstanding this mixture every where, of good with evil, of falshood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The purity in every kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Devil, in the Image of Baal, Ashtaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like, was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may believe the most ancient and religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehort wise and learned men in these days from attributing those virtues, influences, and inclinations to the Stars and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympathetical, and Anipathetical working of Herbs, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost virtues, sometimes taught by the Devil, and applied by his Ministers to harmful and uncharitable ends, can never terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the using of them to the help and comfort of Man-kind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Devil betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observations of Dreams; so far as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to mark flying of Fowls (as signs of good or evil success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against Rain, or to any observation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be given. For, if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not only condemn all honest Trades and interchange amongst men (for there are that deceive in all Professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and cover it over with a most scornfull and beggarly ignorance: and (as Pliny teacheth) we should shew our selves, Ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaque lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Unthankfull towards those, who with pains and care have discovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed, not only these natural knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks also, and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned learned, judge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni scribitur, elucet; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate; In the Glass of the Mathematicks, that Truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obscuring, but in a neer and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawfull Magick.

It is true, that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name Magick: and esteemed abusively to be as branches of that Tree, on whose root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy, or Goetia: and of this again there are divers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the Graves of the dead, to whom the Devil himself gives answer in stead of those that seem to appear. For certain it is, that the immortal souls of men do not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soul: and therefore the soul is not to be found in the Graves.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute, or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring, or raising up Devils, of whom they hope to learn what they list. These men are so distrust, as they believe, that by terrible words they make the Devil to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keep out a Mouse) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtless, they forget that the Devil is not terrified from doing ill, and all that is contrary to God and goodness, no, not by the fearful Word of the Almighty; and that he feared not to offer to fit in Gods feet, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himself called the Son of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of himself, that he can draw the Devil out of Hell, and terrifie with a Phrase: whereas it is very truth, the obedience which the Devils seem to use, is but thereby to possess themselves of the bodies and souls of those which raise them up as His Majesty in his Book aforesaid hath excellently taught: That the Devils obedience is only, secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectivo, that is, upon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can do upon those simple and ignorant Devils; which inhabit Iamblicus imagination; but sure I am, the rest are apt enough to come uncalled: and always attending the cogitations of their servants and vassals, do no way need any such inforcement.

Or, it may be that these Conjurers dealt altogether with Cardians mortal Devils, following the opinion of Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kind of Devils lived not above a thousand years: which Phutarch in his Treatise of Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great God Pan. For, were it true, that the Devils were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they always fear those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus, when he had lifted him up in the air, cast him headlong out of his claws, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this, perhaps, were done by S. Peter's Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same pranks at other times, upon his own accord, the Devil played with Theodotus; who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to have been) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like success had Eudæus, a principal Pillar of the Manichean Heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiastical History witnesseth: and for a manifest proof hereof, we see it every day, that the Devil leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himself a Peg-ass, to convey them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so think: For those that received not the truth (saith S. Paul) God shall send them strong illusions: Of these their supposed transporations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majesty in the 2^d Book, & the 4th Chap. of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive: Another sort there are, who take on them to include spirits in Glasses & Crystals; of whom Cyprian: Fatui sunt Incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro volunt spiritum includere, quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore: They are foolish Incanters, which will shut up their spirits within their nails; or in Glass: for a spirit cannot be included by a body.

There is also another art besides the aforesaid, which they call Theurgie, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven and communicate withall. But the admitting Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator; so, seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to think (except the Devil have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the Professors thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed purity of life, by the ministry of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immaterial substances, and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Insemination, or men of evil faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Devils, which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Divinations; as by fire, called Pyromantia; by water, called Hydromantia; by the air, called Aerotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other, is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practicers whereof are no less envious and cruel, revengeful and bloody, than the Devil himself. And these accursed creatures, having sold their souls to the Devil, work two ways; either by the Devil immediately, or by the Art of poisoning. The difference between Necromancers and Witches, his Majesty hath excellently taught in a word: that one (in a fort) command; the other obey the Devil.

There is another kind of petty Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconry, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomet's Dove, which he had used to feed with Wheat out of his ear: which Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breakfast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly, if Banks had lived in elder times, he would have famed all the Incantations of the World: for whosoever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Incantments (which the Marjans, a people of Italy, practised: Colubros disrumpit Marjaca cantu: incanting Marjia makes the Snakes to uncoil.) That it hath been used, it appears, Psal. 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kind, and even by natural causes it may be done. For, there are many fumes that will either draw them out, or destroy them; as womens hair burnt, and the like. So many things may be laid in the entrance of their holes that will allure them; and therein I find no other Magick, or Incantments than to draw out a Mouse with a piece of tosted Cheese.

Of divers ways by which the Devil seemeth to work his wonders.

But to the end that we may not dote with the Atanickes, who make two powers of gods: that we do not give to the Devil any other dominion than he hath (not speak of his ability, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to Davids, was destroyed by evil Angels) he otherwise worketh but three ways. The first is, by moving the cogitation and affections of men: The second, by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And, that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first, a natural impotency: the second, their own reason disliking them from daring overmuch, or indeed (and that which is the only certain cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Jemens eos ligatos (saith the same Author) velut immanissimas belluas. S. Augustine was of opinion, that the Frogs which Pharaoh's Sorcerers produced, were not natural, but that the Devil (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be such. For, as Varus observeth, those Frogs of the Incanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof, saith Saint Augustine: Nec sane Demones naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo create sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt: The Devils create not any creatures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seem to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. Question he gives the reason. Demon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentie, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet (that is) The Devil fills with certain clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beam of the mind is wont to open the light of reason.

And, as Tertullian in his Book de Anima rightly conceiveth, if the Devil can possess himself of the eyes of our minds, and blind them, it is not hard for him to dazzle those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God putteth out, the Devil entereth in, beginning with the fantasy; by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soul: for the fantastic is most apt to be abused by vain apprehensions.

Aquinas, on the contrary, held, that those Frogs were not imaginary, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magice artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam nam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Augustine could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and S. Augustine in another case like unto this (to wit) of the turning of Dionedes his companions into Birds, per ad hoc cum passis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not persuaded that S. Augustine doth believe that of Dionedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis, a man very learned also, confirmeth. For speaking of natural Magick, he useth these words: De hisjussodi autem operibus, & subita generatio ranarum, & pedicularum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutoribus, ipsa seminaturæ confortant, & accunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus nature videatur (que tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Demonum. &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt, talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: in such works (saith he) the sudden generation of Frogs and Lice and Worms, and some other creatures is: in all which, Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the seeds of Nature, and quickening them; in such wise, that they so hasten the work of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant, not to be the work of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it done by the powers of Devils. But they who are learned in these Arts, marvel not at such working, but glorify the Creator. Now, by these two ways the Devils do most frequently work (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of nature, and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God only.

For, shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, & tempests; and can infect the air, as well as move it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also natural? Or, may it be objected that he foretelleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder Ages he stole his knowledge out of the Predictions of the Prophets: and foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the world to this day, and observed the success of every counsel: he that by reason of his swift motions can inform himself of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsel with all those that study and practise subversion and destruction: he that is Prince of the air, and can thence better judge, than those that inhabit the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea, if he should not very oftentimes guess rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see, that wise and learned men do oftentimes by comparing like causes, conceive rightly of like effects before they happen: and yet, where the Devil doubteth, and would willingly keep his credit, he evermore answereth by Riddles: as Cræsus Halys penetrans magnam subvertit opum vim:

If Cræsus over Halys go,
Great Kingdoms he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own kingdom, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Devil may proceed in Predictions, which otherwise belong to God only, as it is in Ezay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; Shew as at all times, and certainly what is to come. Solus enim divine intelligentia est, occulta nosse & revelare; It is only proper to Gods understanding and wisdom to know and reveal hidden things.

§. VIII.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

To conclude, It may be objected, that the Devil hath raised from the dead; and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel, raised by the Witch of Endor; which, were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Devil's acts exceeded all the powers of Nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Justin Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed; and so was Anubros, Lysa, and Burgensis, from which Authorities those men borrow strength which so believe. But Martyr changed his opinion; and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent For in his Questions upon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to think it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt anime piarum de civitate corpore separate, impiorum autem penas luunt, donec istarum ad vitam eternam, illarum vero ad eternam mortem que secunda dicitur, corpora reviviscant; The souls of the godly separated from their bodies, are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the just rise to eternal life, and of the wicked to an eternal and second death.

And

And (besides S. Augustine) Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostom, and others, believed firmly, and taught it: that the souls of men, being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyril) quoniam a corporibus sanctorum animae abierint, tantquam in manus charissimi patris bonitatis divinae commendari; We must believe, when the souls of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the divine Goodness, as into the hands of a most dear Father. If then they be in heaven, the power of the Devil cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From Hell there is no redemption. For, there are but two habitations after death: Unum (saith Augustine) in igne eterno; alterum in regno eterno; The one in eternal fire, the other in Gods eternal Kingdom. And though it be written in Jure Pontificio, that many there are who believe, that the dead have again appeared to the living; yet the Gloss upon the same Text finds it ridiculous: Credunt, & male, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Gloss) They believe, and they believe amiss, because they be but Phantasmes, or apparitions. For, whereas any such voice hath been heard, saying, I am the Soul of such a one: Hec oratio a fraude atque deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Devil, saith Chrysostom. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian: Abstine animam cuiuslibet sancti, nedum Prophetae, a demonio credamus extrahi; God forbid that we should think that the soul of any holy man, much less of a Prophet, should be drawn up again by a Devil.

It is true, that the Scriptures call that apparition, Samuel; so do they the wooden Images, Cherubims; and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a Book not numbered among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustine himself in this Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Syracides, following the literal sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proveth nothing at all; For, though the Devil would willingly perswade, that the souls (yea, even of just men) were in his power; yet so far is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods just and mercifull nature, and so contrary to all divine reason, as S. Augustine (or whosoever wrote that Book before cited) might rightly tear it a detestable opinion so to think. For, if God had so abolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him, either by Dreams, by Urim, or by his Prophets: it were forth to conceive, that he would permit the Devil, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Saul's respect; it being also contrary to his divine Law, to ask counsel of the dead: as in Deut. 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Devil, and not the Soul of a dead body, that gave answer and advice.

But because Helias and Helizai had raised some from the dead by the power of God; those Devils which Saint Augustine calleth Ladificatores animantium sibi subiectorum; Mockers of their own vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their ears, like the voices of men, do also perswade their graceless and accursed attendants, that themselves both possesse, and have power over the souls of men. Eldidit Diabolus aciem tuam sanctum tuum, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. Vives; The Devil beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Devil's power, whom, if we will not fear, we must fear to sin. For, when he is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himself his voluntary vassal: Potest ad malum invitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine; He can allure, but he cannot enforce to evil. Such as think otherwise, may go into the number remembered by Lucretius:

In tenebris metuant: sic nos in luce ti-memus.*

We fear by light, as children in the dark.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife Semiramis, and of other her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus; and the beginning of Semiramis Reign.

But to come back to Ninus, the amplifier and finisher of Ninive: whether he performed it before or after the overthrow of Zoraster, it is uncertain. As for the City it self, it is agreed by all profane Writers, and by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For in circuit, and furlongs; it had in compass 440. stadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot upright, and had such a breadth, as three Chariots might pass on the Rampire in front: these walls were garnished with 1500. Towers, which gave exceeding beauty to the rest, and strength, no less admirable for the nature of those times.

But this City (built in the Plains of Assyria, and on the banks of Tygris, and in the region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately, Naclerus) had the name of Campfor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gave it a wall, and called it after his own name.

For these works of Babylon and Ninive begun by Nimrod in Chaldaea, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninive, Semiramis Babylon: wherein she sought to exceed her husband by far. Indeed, in the first Age, when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded: labouring to build Towns and Villages, for the use of themselves and their people, without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Briars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that Age, when Ambition was strong in youth: and purposing to follow the Conquest which her husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

This she did after the death of her husband Ninus; who, after he had mastered Bactria, and subjected unto his Empire all those Regions between it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellepont (Asia the less excepted) and finished the work of Ninive; he left the world in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 25. years. Plutarch reporteth, that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute sovereign power for one day. Diod. Siculus, out of Athenaeus, and others, speaks of five days. In which time (moved either with desire of Rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandal cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her, after his death, the sole Rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylon in Chaldaea, to Ninive in Assyria. Justin reports, that Semiramis (the better to invett her self, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her self to the people in person of her Son Ninias, or Zawes, who bare her external form and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as the ruled long, so the performed all those memorable Acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that Letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her own name. And were it true that her Son Ninias had such a stature at his fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very

And (besides S. Augustine) Justin Martyr, Helvius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostom, and others, believed firmly, and taught it: that the souls of men, being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: credere debemus (saith Cyril) quum à corporibus sanctorum anime abscerint, tanquam in manus charissimæ patris bonitati divinæ commendari; We must believe, when the souls of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the divine Goodness, as into the hands of a most dear Father. If then they be in heaven, the power of the Devil cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From Hell there is no redemption. For, whereas any such voice hath been heard, saying, I am the Soul of such a one; Hec oratio à fraude atque deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Devil, saith Chrysostom. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian: Absti ut animam cuiuslibet sancti, nedium Prophetæ, à demonio credamus extraham; God forbid that we should think that the Soul of any holy man, much less of a Prophet, should be drawn up again by a Devil.

It is true, that the Scriptures call that apparition, Sæmuel; so do they the wooden Images, Cherubims: and false brazen gods are gods; and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a Book not numbered among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustine himself in this Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Syracides; following the literal fence and phrase of the Scriptures, proveth nothing at all; For, though the Devil would willingly

For, if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him, either by Dreams, by Urim, or by his Prophets: it were forthill to conceive, that he would permit the Devil, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Saul's respect; it being also contrary to his divine Law, to ask counsel of the dead: as in Deut. 18. and elsewhere. Indeed, in the first Age, when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded: labouring to build Towns and Villages, for the use of themselves and their people, without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Briars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that Age, when Ambition was strong in youth: and purposing to follow the Conquest which her husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

This she did after the death of her husband Ninus; who, after he had mastered Babylonia, and subjected unto his Empire all those Regions between it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellepont (Asia the less excepted) and finished the work of Ninive; he left the world in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 25. years. Plutarch reporteth, that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute sovereign power for one day. Diod. Siculus, out of Athenæus, and others, speaks of five days. In which time (moved either with desire of Rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menor, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandal cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her, after his death, the sole Rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylon in Chaldea, to Ninive in Assyria. Justine reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest her self, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her self to the people in person of her Son Ninias, or Zaneus, who bare her external form and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as the ruled long, so he performed all those memorable Acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that Letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her own name. And were it true that her Son Ninias had such a stature as his fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that the could have held the Empire from him 42. years after by any such subtilty (for so long he reigned after the death of her husband;) but it may be true, that Ninias, or Zameis (being wholly given to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his mothers prosperous government and undertakings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage and Education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

SOME Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of base Parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was born, Semiramis. Africanus, of Ascalon, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the Daughter of Derecta, a Canticum of Ascalon, exceeding beautiful. Others say, that this Derecta or Derectis, the mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Reluctant and had profest a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the bank of a Lake adjoining to Ascalon; and afterward falling in love with a goodly young man, she was by him made with child, which (for fear of extreme punishment) she conveyed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high Reeds which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wilde Beasts) the same was fed by certain Birds, which used to feed upon, or near those Waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoining to this Lake, had the charge and fostering of this child, who being per chance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonour and breach of Vow; notwithstanding which, she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, and (as the Poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty and humane shape. It is thought, that from this Derecta, the invention of that Idol of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a Mans face, and a Fishes body; into whose Temple when the Ark of God was brought, the Idol fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained only the trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierom hath converted that place. Vata- blus, Pagninus, and Junius, write it by Dagon only, which signifieth a Fish, and so it only appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my self, I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistims, was an Idol representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods under Nephtune. For this City being maritime (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phenicia) used all their devotions to Nephtune, and the rest of the petty gods which attended him.

§. IV.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after disfigurement with a note of the improbability of her vices.

BUT for her Pedigree, I leave it to Affryan Herald; and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy & ease do more often accompany licentiousness in men and women, than labour and hazzard do. And if the one half be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princess more worthy of Fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon, and elsewhere, and for the Wars she made with glorious success: all but her last enterprise of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report, that she never returned: and that of all her most powerfull Army, there survived but only twenty persons; the rest, being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the Famine, or slain by the Sword of Stanrobates. But, as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbered; so were those that returned, less than could have escaped of such an Army, as consisted of four Millions and upwards. For these numbers, which she levied by her Lieutenant Derectans (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three Millions; of Horse-men one Million; of Chariots, armed with hooks on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which fought upon Camels as many; of Camels for burthen, two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all uses, three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads, three thousand, by which the might transport over Indus at once, three hundred thousand soldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. The incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had every Man and Beast but fed on grass) are taken from the Authority city of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himself hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes Expedition into Greece and afterwards; whose Army (though the same was far inferior to that of Semiramis) yet it had weight enough to over-load the belief of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece, an army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to pass the Hellspont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the several Provinces whence those Gallies were taken, hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soever the Army of Semiramis consisted, the same being broken, and overthrown by Stanrobates, upon the banks of Indus, Canticum cantavit extremum; She sang her last song; and (as Antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the Bird of Venus) whence it came, that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their Ensigns.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis; and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

AMONG all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (besides the wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, invironed with a wall carried four square of great height and beauty, having on each square, certain brazen Gates curiously engraven. In the Core of the square, she raised a Tower of a furlong high, which is half a quarter of a mile; and upon it again (taking a Basis of a less circuit) she set a second Tower; and so eight in all, one above another, upon the top whereof the Chaldean Priests made the Observation of the Stars; because this Tower over-topped the ordinary clouds.

By beholding the ruins of this Tower, have many Travellers been deceived; who suppose that they have seen a part of Nimrod's Tower, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple, one hundred thousand talents of Frankincense every year (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nebuchodonosor adorn with the spoils of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Solomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redelivered. This Temple Xerxes evened with the soil; which Alexander is said to have repaired, by the perservations of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might have been in his design to do; but he enjoyed but a few years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any such work. The Egyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and level ground, and given to the same superstition of the Stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same service and use, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were conspired undique navigantibus, saith Pliny. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius, a careful observer of Rarities (who being in Egypt, mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa sommite, & tirant une fleche en l'air, a peine pourroit l'envoyer hors de sa base q'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez; The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramides, and shooting an arrow from thence into the air, as far as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same; but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

THE SECOND BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and the use of this Question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the Successors of Semiramis: with a brief transition to the Question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

After the death of Semiramis, Ninias, or Zamek, succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berossus Annianus bestows the conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Justine, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of Warr at all, but altogether feminine, and subjected to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now, because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealousy he every year changed his Provincial Governours, and built Colleges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced again the Bactrians and Caspians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralime, the successor of Arius; but that he added sumptuousity, invented Jewels of Gold and Stone, and some Engines for the Warr: I will, for this present, pass them over, and while follow Abraham, whose ways are warrantable (till we meet these Assyrians again in this Story) by whom, and by whose issues, we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Nimus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralime, and Xerxes, or Balanir. For, otherwise, if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures let us down without error, by the reigns of the Assyrian Princes; we shall but patch up the Story at adventure, and leave it in the same confusion, in which, to this day, it hath remained. For, where the Scriptures do not help us, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis, Historiam non constare; No marvel if then in things very antient, History want assistance.

The better therefore to find out, in what Age of the World, and how long, these Assyrian Kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abraham's

Abraham's Birth, and in what year the same happened after the Flood. Now, since all agree that the three and fourtieth year of Nimus, was the birth-year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what year after the Flood, the birth of Abraham happened, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. years; others 352. years between Abraham's Birth and the Flood: a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

Archiloctus de temporibus (as we find him in Annius) makes but 250. years from the Flood to Nimus: then seeing that Abraham was born in the three and fourtieth year of Nimus, according to Eusebium and Saint Augustine, it followeth, by the addition of those two numbers, that the year of Abraham's Birth, was in the year after the Flood 293. or, as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, since I do here enter into that never resolved Question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give Reason for my own Opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Envy casteth at Novelty, than to go on safely and sleepily in the easy ways of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

§. II.

A Proposal of Reasons or Arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292. after the Flood, and not in year 352.

Those who seek to prove this account of 292. years, between the general Flood and Abraham's Birth, ground themselves; first, on these words of the Scripture: So Terah lived 70. years, and begat Abraham, Nabor, and Haran: Secondly, upon the Opinion of Josephus, Saint Augustine, Bede, Isidore, and many of the ancient Hebrews before them: Authorities (while they are slightly looked over) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First, out of the words as they lie; That Terah, at 70. years begot Abraham, Nabor, and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, ought in this respect to be counted the eldest Son of Terah, and so necessarily born in the seventieth year of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heir of the Blessing; and not of Nabor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter, was to set down the Genealogie of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nabor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest Son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtful. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was born more assuredly in the 130. year of Terah his age, than in the 131, 132, &c. Moses having no where set down precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very year, in which his father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. years: seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to be made a father at 100. years.

§. III.

The Answer to the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his fathers death.

To answer all which Objections, it is very easy, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned Divines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine own, according to the small talent which God hath given me. Now, for as much as the state of the Question cannot well be scanned, unless the time of Abraham's journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend unto the particular examination of these Arguments, I will make bold with order and method so far, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his travels, that serveth as a ground for this Opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan: the later after his fathers death, the former presently upon his calling; which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a conjecture drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it is written,

By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God, to go out into a place which he should afterwards receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This Supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the Supposition it self.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charan, or Haran, after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction by these words of Saint Stephen: And after his father was dead, God brought him into this land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place, so direct and plain, what force hath any mans fancy or supposition, perverting, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability or reason to induce it? For, if any man out of this place before alleged can pick any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I think it reason, that he be believed in the rest. But, that he performed the Commandment of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur & Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For, if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jews, his adversaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himself, and the Gospel of Christ. Indeed, we shall find small reason to make us think, that Abraham passed and re-passed those ways, more often than he was enforced so to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his faith in Gods promises: In which, if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn Nations: a Nation of valiant and resolved Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driven to flee into Egypt for relief. His wife was old, and he had no Son to inherit the Promise. And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for sacrifice; all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, let us consider the ways themselves, which Abraham had to pass over; the length whereof was 300. English miles; and through Countreys of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great River of Euphrates, to travel through the dangerous & barren Deferts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high mountains of Libanus, Hermon, or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let every reasonable man judge. For, if he travelled it twice; then was his journey in all, 1800. miles from Ur to Haran; and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proof (that he had not animus revertendi, not any thought of looking backward) than any mans bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham took Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers Son, and all their substance that they possessed, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now, if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his wife and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Countrey as that was: or, if he could have been thereto moved, it is more likely, that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsettled, and preſt with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger, both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abrahams return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back thither, about the time of his fathers death: so they, perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage, their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over-troublesome. They say, that Abraham was in Haran at his fathers death, or some time after, being then, by their account, 135. years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within four four or five years after that time, his greatest, or (as may seem) his only care? Did not he bind with a very solemn oath, his principal servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travel into those parts, and seek out a Wife for Isaac his Son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly design any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely, if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgment, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, virtue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his only Son, who was then five and thirty years old; before which age, most of the Patriarchs after the Flood had begotten children; rather than have left all at random to the consideration of a servant, that neither knew any, nor was known of any, in that Countrey. But, let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot his business when he was there, or that something what happened, which no man can devise; What might be the reason, that Abrahams son, in doing his Masters errand, was fain to lay open the whole Story of his Masters prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had born to him a Son in her old age? If Abraham himself, a more certain Author, had so lately been among them, would not all this have been an idle tale? It were needless to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would, perhaps, be a question hardly answerable; considering how averse he was from permitting his son to be carried thither, even though a Wife of his own kinsred could not have been obtained without his personal presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his Parents, to take a Wife of his own linage, not without Gods especial approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that journey; yet he lived there as a servant; suffered many injuries; and finally, was driven to convey himself from thence by flight. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written Examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lot's Wife, contains much matter. Let us consider Mesopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites were delivered: we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the Posterity of the Hebrews. When Hesecias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seems that he conceived great pleasure in his mind, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the Prophecy which thereupon he heard by Elyas, made him to know, that the counsel of God was not agreeable to such thoughts; which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the Waters of Babylon they sat down and wept. Concerning Egypt, we read, that Sesac and Neco, Kings of Egypt, brought calamity upon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours, was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt, I do not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more return that way; which is given, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: That he never returned, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But, because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can persuade those of judgment or understanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the travels of Abraham are precisely let down in the Scriptures: as first from Ur, or Camerna in Chaldea to Haran, or Charan: and then from Haran (after his fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he removed to a mountain between Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither again, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattel were more then could be fed in that part: from thence the second time he removed to Mamre, near Hebron: and thence, having pursued Anrabel, and rescued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea under Abimelec: and after, near unto it at Zerzabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his Son Isaac on the mountain Moriab. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran, or Charan, appeareth not in any one Story, either divine or humane. Now, if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Leuita his Cabala hath feined, it should in reason be therewith all be believed, that he would in those his first first travels have provided himself of some certain seat, or place of abiding: and not have come a second time with his Wife, kinsmen, family, goods, and Cattel, not knowing whereon to rest himself. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, passed through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the plain of Asteriab; where, finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel, and Haie: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out some fit habitation: from whence again, as it is written in Genesis the eleventh, He went forth, going and journeying towards the South: and always unsettled. By reason of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebraei.

Most in cold.

Further, to prove that he had not formerly been in the Country, we may note, that ere he came into Bethel and Haie, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this Land, shewing it him, as unto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him unknown. For, Abraham, without any other provident care for himself, believed in the Word of the living God: neither tending before, nor committing first to discover it; but being arrived, he received a second Promise from God, that he would give those Countries unto him and his seed to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should move any man to think, that Moses would have omitted any such double journey of Abraham's, seeing he set down all his passages elsewhere, long and short? as when he moved from Sichem, and seated between Haie and Bethel, the distance being but 20. miles: and when he moved thence to the Valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles; and when he left Mamre, and sat down at Gerar, being less than six miles; No, Moses past over all the times of the first Age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the Story of Abraham: shutting up all between the Creation and the Flood in fix Chapters; which Age lasted 1656. years: but he bestowed on the Story of Abraham, fourteen Chapters, beginning with his Birth in the eleventh, and ending with his Death in the five & twentieth; and this time endured but 175. years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected anything concerning Abraham's travels, or other actions: or that he would set down those small removes of five miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey in going and coming would have ministred some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to Abraham's Story.

§. IV.

The Answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing, that it was not unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year.

NOW, touching the Objection, where it is said, that it was very unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year, seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to have a Son at an hundred; this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed mis-cast, and mistaken: Abraham having respect onely to Sarah his Wife, when he spake of their many years. For, when the Angel said unto Abraham in his Tent door at Mamre; Loe, Sarah thy Wife shall have a Son, it followeth in the next Verse, Now, Abraham and Sarah were old, and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is laid it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah, had many Sons after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Jockhanan, Medan, Ishbak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was born 37. years after Isaac; and the youngest 40. years after. What strangeness then, that Terah, being 130. years old, should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at 100. years? For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145. and Isaac was born in the year 2109. and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5. Ions 36. years after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. years old; it is not strange, that his father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Jesse, who lived so many years and Ages after Abraham, begat Sons at 100. years, or near it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. and Abraham others at the same age, and seven years after.

Gen. 11.
in Gen.

§. V.

The Answer to two more of the Objections: shewing that we may have certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son; and that there was great cause why in the Story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

IT follows now, to speak something to the Objection, which brings Abrahams age altogether together in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest Son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70. years old. For Abraham's age being made uncertain, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this Proposition, That we cannot be certain of Abraham's his age, unless we make him the eldest Son, is false. For it is plain in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the year of his death; then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, That S. Stephen hath told us, that Abraham's departure followed the death of his father Terah; and Terah died at 205. so as the 75. year of Abraham was the 205. year of Terah; which known, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now, to come to the Objection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nabor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses, for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nabor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nabor and Haran, were they Idolaters, or otherwise. For Nabor was the father of Israhel, and Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Israhel, and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcab; and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and Grandmother to Jacob: Milcab also, the wife of Nabor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacob's great Grandmother; and the age of Sarah, the Daughter of Haran, is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a Son at 90. years, and when by nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nabor and Abraham married the Daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nabor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the Daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nabor; it was not superfluous in Moses to give light of those men and times, and though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is, Jos. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to think, that they still continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their natural Country and City of Ur in Chaldees, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his father Terah, ere they left Chaldees; but Lot, his Son, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nabor also, who remained at Charran, gave his Sons daughters to Isaac, & Jacob, his own kinsmen: he himself having also married in his own Family; not thinking it pleasing unto God, to mix themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For, when Laban had seen the servant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers house in this manner, Come in thou blessed of Jehovah, &c. And when this servant of Abraham's demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said, Nothing is proceeded of Jehovah; meaning, that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse, it is written; Take, go, thou shalt be thy Masters Sons wife, even as Jehovah hath said. This their often using of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a sign that they had the knowledge of him.

Now, although it be the opinion of Crysolomus, and some late Writers, as Cajetan, Oleaster, Musculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certain Idols, or household-gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet, that he believed in the true God, it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nabor, and he called Abrahams servant, blessed of Jehovah, as aforesaid. So as, for my self, I dare not avow, that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the Faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest; together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest Son of Terah.

TO the main Objection; which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to overturn the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest Son of Terah; and born in the 70. year of Terah's life; grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah lived seventy years, and begat Abraham, Nabor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proof at all that he was the eldest and first-born Son of Terah. For it is no necessary consequent, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest eldest in blood and birth; neither doth it appear, that it pleased God to make especial choice of the first Sons in nature and time: for Seth was not the first-born of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Juda and Joseph of Jacob; nor David the eldest of Jesse; nor Solomon of David; as is formerly remembered.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. years old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet: shewing that at the 500. year of his age, he began to beget the first of those three Sons. For, according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio futura dignitatis: in qua excellit Abraham: The order of nativity is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity; in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the Sons of Noah, so is it here; where it is said, That Terah lived 70. years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sons, himself being begotten by his father Nahor, at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah; for whereas Adam begat Seth at 133. Enosh Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahaleleel at 70. Mahaleleel Jared at 60. Noah was yet 500. years old when he began to beget the first of his three Sons, as aforesaid. And Saint Augustine, in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the Opinion, that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's Sons, than otherwise: though for his excellency he was worthily named first. His own words are these: Fieri enim ut potius posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentia, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later; but was first named, in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last, proveth nothing who was first or last born; either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing; for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in God's favour. Pietas ergo, vel ipsa potius electio diuina, que comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timor, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare: Piety, saith he, or rather diuine election, which doth evermore draw with it, or after it, Piety; and the fear of God, gave place and precedency to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest, it is manifest, that Abraham entered Canaan in the 75. year of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had lived 86. years. It was at Gerar (the south border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 165. years. It was from the valley of Maure in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he refused Lot, & overthrew Amraphel; and he had then but the age of 83. years: and it is as manifest, that he parted from Haran after his father Terah was dead. But, if Terah begat Abraham at 70. years old, then must Abraham have been 135. years when he first set his foot in Canaan, seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. make 205. the true age of Terah; which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembered: For he entered at 75. he refused Lot at 83. he had Ismael at 86. he had Isaac at 100. proved by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest Son of Terah, and born in the 70. year of his age: then had Terah lived till Isaac had been 35. years old, and Ismael 49. both which must then have been born in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: unless we should either deny credit to S. Stephen, who saith, that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his father's death: or else believe the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Cronologia antoptica, saith it was about his father's death; because the Greek word may be translated by the Latin sub, as well as by post: which, though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say, that those things were done about Terah's death, which were 60. years before. Wherefore, supposing Abraham to have been born in the 70. year of Terah; we must give those times and places of birth to Abraham's children, which no Authority will warrant; for Abraham had no children in Ur of Chaldea, nor in Haran, nor in ten years after his arrival into Canaan. For the year of Terah's death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the World, 2083. and the year of Ismael's birth was the World's year, 2094, which maketh ten years difference: And that Isaac was born in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the mountain Moriah therein, 39. miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited; and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Maure, no man doubteth. And therefore it cannot be, that any of Abraham's Sons were born in Mesopotamia, nor while Terah lived: nor less than ten years after Terah's death; and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest Son of Terah, nor born in the 70. year of Terah's age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75. if Terah had begotten him at 70. then then had Terah lived but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also have been the full age of Terah; but Terah lived 205. years, and therefore was not Abraham born in the 70. year of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah, or Ischab, wanted but ten years of Abraham's age: Isaac being born when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. years old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had been the elder brother of Haran, Haran must have begotten Sarah at nine years old: for granting that Haran was born but one year after Abraham, and Sarah within ten years as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had lived but nine years; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And, that Ischab was Sarah, Rab, Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principality. Again, to what end was the word Ischab of Ischab inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For, to speak of anything superfluous, it is not used in God's Book: and if Ischab had not belonged to the Story, it had been but an idle name, to no purpose remembered.

Now, if it had been true (as those of the contrary opinion affirm) that Moses had no respect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the Parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Ischab in this place, were she not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name, of whom there is nothing else first or last?

The age also of Lot disproveth the elder ship of Abraham; for Lot was called an old man, when Abraham was but 83. years old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were father to Lot, Sarah, and Ischab; Abraham marrying one of Haran's Daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah also being within ten years as old as Abraham; it may appear to every reasonable man (not obtinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham; who also died first, and before his father left Ur in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against this opinion of Abraham's elder ship, upon the same place of Genesis; drawing arguments from the age of Sarah, who was but ten years younger than Abraham himself. Lyra's words are these: Si igitur Haran fuit junior ipso Abraham, sequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imo nec octo, &c. and afterward, & ideo melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimò na-

tus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter ejus dignitatem: & ponendū ē ut caput stirpis, & generationis sequentis: & quia primò facta ē ei reponitio expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum ē de Sem, &c. If therefore (sic Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himself, it followeth, that he was not ten years old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last born of the three Sons of Thare, nevertheless, he is named first for his dignity, both because he was to be ordained head of the stock and generation following, and because the Promise of Christ was first made unto him, as before it is said of Sem.

§. VII.

A Conclusion of this Dispute, noting the Authors on both sides; with an Admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient Stories the more improbable.

It therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was born in the 130. year of Terah's life, and not in the 70. year. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed, when he was 75. years old; these two numbers added, make 205. years, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entered Canaan. For my self, I have no other end herein, than to manifest the Worlds folly. I reverence the judgments of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtful, and could not determine this controversy. For, whatsoever is borrowed out of his sixteenth Book de Civitate Dei, cap. 15. the same may be answered out of himself in his five and twentieth Question upon Genesis. But S. Augustine herein followed Josephus and Isidor; and Beda followed S. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanity, that the Hebrews and Josephus sought to make Abraham the first born: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Josephus, together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorify the Jewish Nation) make Abraham a King, entitling Sarah by the name of Queen Sarah; and said, that Abraham was followed with 318. Captains, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; trecentos & octodecim prefectos habuit, quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharaoh invading him with a great Army, took from him his Wife Sarah: Such Fables argue that that Josephus is not to be believed, but with discreet reservations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292 years from the Flood to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgment in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in setting down the succession of the Perſian Kings under whom they lived, whose History was not so far remote in time, as these Antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good Writers. Yet grossly have they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom find their opinion reheated without the confusion treading on the heels of it. They of the Roman Religion, are also generally on the same side; it being a thing usual among them, to maintain whatsoever they have been formerly known to hold and believe. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him; of later times, Beroaldus, Penſer, Calſein, Junius, Ecza, Ermonſtor, Doct, Gibbons, and Moore, with divers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to have been born in the 130. year of his father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) divers of the same Religion, and those, nevertheless, good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chitrens, Fundinus and others, are very averse herein, especially Josephus Scaliger with his Sethus Caluſius, proclaiming Beroaldus an arch-heretic in Chronology, and condemning this opinion of his as poisonous. Contrariwise, Augustinus Tornellus, a Priest of the Congregation of S. Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free Writer, whose Annals are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered; not alleging Beroaldus, nor any Protestant Writer, as being, perhaps, unwilling to owe thanks to Heretics. For my self, I do neither milike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this later account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant Writers have approved it; but for the truth it self. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of judgment, that the best approved Historians, divine, and prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the Stories, and fore-past actions of the World; and not the truth of Histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgment to our selves, which of those two accounts give the best reputation to the Story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him: who makes but 292 years, or the accounts, between the Flood and Birth of Abraham: or this other account, which make 352 years between the one and the other: the one making Abraham to be the first-born of Thare, in the 70. year of his life; the other a younger Son of Thare, and born when he had lived 130. years. And, if we look over all, and do not hastily satisfy our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatiated do slothfully and drowsily sit down; we shall find it more agreeable, rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some Editions, make it above 1772 years between the Flood and Abraham's Birth; than to take away any part of those 352 years given. For, if we advisedly consider the state and continuance of the World, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was born, we shall find, that it were very ill done of us, by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over-deeply between Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too near the quick, the reputation of the whole Story might, perchance, bleed thereby, were not the testimony of the Scriptures supreme, so as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withall this Precept of S. Augustine. That wherefore any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is, by ignorance of interpretation, misunderstood. For, in Abraham's time, all the then known parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings; Egypt had many magnificent Cities; and so had Palestina, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India; and those not built with sticks, but of hewn stone, and defended with walls and rampires; which magnificence needed a Parent of more antiquity, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to begger doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonder and marvels? giving also strength thereby to common cavillers, and to those mens apish brains, who only bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters, in the Story of the World and Man-kind.

§. VIII.

A Computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the Story of Abraham.

IN this sort therefore, for the reasons before alleged, I conclude, that from the general Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352 years were consumed; and taking the Affri-an History with us, the same number of years were spent from the Flood to the 43. year of Ninus: in which 43. year of Ninus, Abraham was born; which happened in the year of the World, 2009.

Now, of this time of 352 years, we must give one part as well to the increale of those people which came into Shinaar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. years to those that stayed in the East, of which, though Chus, ere he begat Seba; of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet, because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first Sons, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg begat at 30. Reu begat at 32. Shem begat Arphaxad at 35. Arphaxad begat Sale at 35. Sale begat Heber at 34. Heber begat Japheth at 30. in the 23. year of the reign of Nimias Zameis the King of the Affrians, the Son of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirm what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Nimias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt, the answer which first offereth it self as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Nimias, or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel; who invaded Traconitis, or Babylon, and overthrew those five Kings of Pentapolis, or the Valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babylonia; and the times before accounted make him to be the successor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. year of Abraham's life, wherein he rescu'd Lot from Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch; for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first Verse of the fourteenth Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the Valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel; as it is written,

Gen. 14. 4. Twelve years were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the thirteenth year they rebelled, and in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the Kings that were with him; and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principal in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam which is Persia: Now, Persia being seated over Tygris, and to the East of Amraphel's Country; and the other two Kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar, or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it self, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large Dominion. For, had Amraphel been so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis, whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three or four Kings for this Expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings (as it is manifest that he was: For these little Kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel's) yet this makes not the conjecture less probable, but that this Amraphel might be Nimias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Affria had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a down-right fall at the time of this War: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdoms between India and the Phenician Sea; to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Of Arioch, another of the four Kings, and that Ellas, wherof he is said to have been King, lies between Cælofrya and Arabia Petraa.

Now, the two other Kings joined with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one King of Ellas, the other of the Nations. For Ellas, Aquila, and Hierem, write Pontus: so Isidore thinketh that it should be Hellepont: which opinion Peregrinus favoureth. But this is only to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont far distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petraa, or into Idumæa; which Countries these four Kings chiefly invaded: Besides that, it is certain, that the Affrians (when they were greatest) had never any dominion in Asia the less. For at such time as the Affrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the less as Commanders; but used all the art they had, to invite Cressus to their assistance; persuading him, that nothing could be more dangerous for himself, and the other Kings of those parts, than the success of the Medes against the Affrians. But examine the enterprise, what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made war with Bera, Kingdome of Sodome, Bispha King of Gomora, Shinar King of Admath, and Shemeb King of Zeboim, and the King of Bela, which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex; being such a kind of Reguli, as Joshua found in the Land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small Territories adjoining; of which Canaan had three and thirty, all slain or hanged by Joshua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power; and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus, or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weakness in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alleged for an Example, that divers Kings far off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar; yet these same examples, without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatness of these petty Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the World were fixed on Cæsar, and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no less doubtfull than fearfull: But the whole Country by these four Kings maltreated in their passage, was afterward given to the half Tribe of Manasse.

Manasse, Gad, and Reuben; a narrow Valley of ground, lying between Jordan and the Mountains of Seir; inclosed by the River of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybani on the North, consisting of two small Provinces of Traconitis, or Babylon, and the Region of the Moabites; a conquest farr unvaluable, and little answering to the power of the Affrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the less. But as the Vulgar, and Aquila, convert Ellas by Pontus: So Symmachus makes Arioch, a King of the Scythians; a King indeed, as far fetched to join with the Affrians in this War, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint do not change the word of Ellas at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the Mountains whereof the Ark did rest; so do they in this place retain the word Ellas, being doubtfull to give it a wrong interpretation. And Peregrinus himself remembereth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus, or Hellepont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Græcian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellas in the border of Cælofrya: and Saint Hierom calleth Ellas the City of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now, although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cælofrya, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was King; who formerly joined with Ninus in all his Conquests, being of the same Family, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch; and afterward Ain Arctas; as in the Machabees: the Kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Arctas, commanding in Damascus. They were Princes, for the most part, confederate and depending upon the Affrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel; that in the time of Nebuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his Army, and the principal Commander under him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plain, that Arioch here spoken of, the Son of that Arioch, Confederate of Ninus, was no King of Pontus; nor of Scythia, Regions far removed from the Affrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch, who commanded under Nebuchodonosor, is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans; who are a Nation of Perlians, bordering Pliny sets it between the Sea-coast and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings, or other of that House (known by the name of Arim, Arioch, Arctas, or Arctas) had the Government of that Perlian Province, called Elymais (as it seemeth they had, by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nebuchodonosor's time. But this Arioch here spoken of, may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the Son of Arim, the Confederate of Ninus, whose Sons held league, as their fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West unto Babylonia, and Chaldea; and in amity with them from the beginning, and of their own House and Blood; which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

Diod. Siculus
lib. 2. c. 4.

§. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.

The fourth King by Abraham overthrown, was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt People; Calvin of Runnagates without habitation. Peregrinus out of Strabo, finds that Galilea was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt People: namely, of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant; Such are the Inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo; and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And so it may be; but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this Question. For Galilea was not Peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For, when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty Kingdoms adjoining to Phenicia and Palestina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicea, Apamæa, Chalcidice, Cæsarea, Chalibonitis, and all these do also join themselves to Aleppopotamia on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

§. XII.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia; and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

Asily, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provincial Governour of Bablylonia, and that the other Kings named, were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinaar, to call the Assyrian a King of Elam: those Kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldaa, Shinaar, Babylonia, or Assyria; but never by Elam: and Chedorlaomer, or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim, which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings wore on their heads.

Neither do I believe, that the Assyrian, or Bablylonian Empire stood in any greatness at the time of this invasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to over-look what it self had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himself: all whole chief Commanders became Kings after him. Tambrlain conquered Asia and India, with a storm-like, and terrible success: but to prevalent fury, God hath adjoined a short life; and whatsoever things Nature her self worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his Victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus, being the first whom the madnels of boundless dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious over them: a man violent, insolent and cruel. Semiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious than her Paramour; enlarged the Bablylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein, with buildings un-exampled. But her Son, having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no less feminine than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continual smart, put the Patient in mind how to cure the one, and revenge the other: so those Kings adjoining (whose subjection and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep, when the advantage was offered by such a success. For, In regno Babilonico hic parum respiciunt: illis king shined little (saith Nauclerius of Ninias) in the Bablylonian Kingdom. And likely it is, that the necks of mortal men, having been never before galled with the yoke of foreign dominion, nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of living in slavery; no long descent having as yet invested the Assyrian with a right; nor any other title being for him pretended, than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate Son of a tyrannous and hated father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerless mastering, and a mind less industrious than his father and mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his mother to reign 42 years, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatness, as he neither endeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what he could not without contentions peril enjoy.

These considerations being joined to the Story of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinaar was rather an inferior to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equal; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Bablylonia.

For conclusion, I will add these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great travel upon Abraham, from Orin Chaldaa to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700 miles, or little less, with women, children, and carriages; the Countries through which he wandered were then settled, and in peace. For it was the 23 year of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand: in which time of 23 years after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their liberty and former estates. For Semiramis's Army of four millions, with her self, utterly consumed in India, and all her armies and engines of war, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunity even to the poorest souls and weakest hearted of the World, to repurchase their former liberty.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and antientest Historians, that Arim the Son of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians, and Cassians, and again subjected them which which needed not, if they had not been revolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recovered one part, so did Baluc, or Balamus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted, to their former obedience. Of whom it is said, that he conquered from Egypt to India; and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, A conqueror and triumpher; which undertakings had been no other than the effects of madnes, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Bablylonian subjection. Now, if we shall make any doubt thereof, that is, of the conquest of Arim and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninias and Ninias, we may as well think thereof of Ninus and Semiramis to be but feined; but if we grant this conquest, then it is true, that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torn alunder, according to that which had been gathered out of Moses, as before remembered.

§. XIII.

That it is not unprobable that the four kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves; and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came; which if so, we need not say, that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

The consent of all Writers, whose works I have come to my perusal, agreeing as they do, that these four Kings, Amraphel of Shinaar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellows, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are, or seem intituled; doth almost enforce us to think, that the history must so be understood, as I have delivered. But, if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for People of those Lands, or if (as Hierom hath it) Chedorlaomer was King of the Elamites, as if Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of People, either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry Regions; then may we otherwise conceive of this History: removing thereby some difficulties, which men, perhaps, have been unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For, as it had been a strange conjecture, to think that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian against the Sodomite, as far as from Pomus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was known, and almost impossible, that the vale of Siddim should have been once named: so in true estimation, it is a thing of great improbability, that Chedor-laomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should pass through to great a part of the World, as the countries of Assyria, Chaldaa, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia and Canaan, to subdue those five Towns, whose very names how they should come to his ear, being disjoined by so many great Nations of different Languages, a wise man could hardly conceive. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Bablylonian himself, yea, the Kingdom of Lusar and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependences; what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorrab? and when he should have sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the Posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five petty Towns, leaving Tyris and Sidon, and the great City Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far neerer unto him, unsubdued? Now, as these doubts, which may be alleged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections, to be made against his conquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea, and more, as being grounded upon the Text it self. For first, what madnes had it been in that small Province, to rebel against so powerful a Monarch? Or if it were so, that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaim them; was it not more than madnes in them, when his terrible Army approached, still to entertain hope of evasion; yea, to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute, and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations between Euphrates, yea, between themselves and the River Indus? Likewise, on the part of Chedorlaomer, we should find no great wisdom, if he, knowing the weakness of this People, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenants, for the perpetual inheritance of that little Country, was not sufficient to countervail one Month's charges of so huge an Army. How small then must his valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Country, although he had broken their Army in the field? Now, the Scriptures do not of this invasion (supposed to great) make any fearful matter; matter; but compose the two Armies as equally match, saying they were four Kings against five; yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham slew all these Kings; of which great slaughter no History makes mention: Neither will the reign of Nimias, who lived four or five years longer, permit that he should have died too soon; neither would Histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these four Kings were not the same that they are commonly thought; nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these Kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title, Lords and Commanders every one of his own company, which he carried forth as a Colony, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the usual manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troop of Perissians, Amraphel some people out of Shinaar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Country which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first Book of Thucydides, with the manner of discoveries, conquests and plantations, in the infancy of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almost as many Kings as several Armies; or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoveries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies, may easily perceive, that it was neither unusual for the leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted; nor to make alliances together, and break them again, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seem the more likely, by the slothful quality of Nimias then reigning in Affria; whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to such undertaking spirits, as wanted the employments whereunto they were accustomed in the reign of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded, whilst others, more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the content of the whole stream of Writers upon this place, make this conjecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authority whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selves to the former conjecture, Amraphel was Nimias; and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloth decayed, he might well be inferior to the Perissian Chedorlaomer: or if this do not satisfy, we may say that Amraphel was an under-king, or Satrapa of Shinaar, under Nimias; who may be supposed to have had his Imperial seat in his fathers City, Ninive; and to have preferred it before Shinaar and Babylon the City of his mother, whom he hated as an usurper of his right. But, if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might erre; then can I think that the opinion, that those four Kings were Leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant, both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto add, that Chedorlaomer seems rather called a Perissian King, than King of Persia: And that Arich (whose Kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a man of action, or being a worthy mans Son, was very well pleased to give passage and assistance to these Captains or petty Kings. These, and such like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost bestowed upon it; especially considering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he find any that shall seem better than these. But of what countries or people soever these four were Kings, this Expedition is the only publick action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to this Story, and of his Sons, and of his Nephews, Elsan and Jacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, either to stand upon things generally known to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath been else where already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembered, we pass them here in silence. And because in the Story of Abraham and his Posterity, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears, that even in the time of Abraham, it was a fertile and flourishing Kingdom; it will not be amiss in the next place to speak somewhat of the Antiquities and first Kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt, from the first Peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A Brief of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt; with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

Soon after the confusion at Babel (as it seems) Cham, with many of his issue and followers (having doubtless known the fertility of Egypt before the Flood) came thither and took possession of the Country; in which they built many Cities; and began the Kingdom one hundred ninety one years after the Deluge. The ancient Governours of this Kingdom, till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are thrown in the Table following.

An. Mond.	An. del.
1847.	191.	Cham .
2008.	352.	Osiris .
2269.	613.	Typhon
		Hercules . }
2276.	620.	Orus .
2391.	735.	Sesoftris the great.
2424.	768.	Sesoftris the blind.
2438.	782.	Euftris , or Osiris the second.
2476.	820.	Acmehere , or Thermutis , or Meris .
2488.	832.	Rathoris , or Athoris .
2497.	841.	Chencres drowned in the Red Sea.

The Table, and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obscurity, manifest and restless truth cannot be found. For Saint Augustine, a man of exceeding great judgement, and incomparable diligence, who had fought into all Antiquities, and had read the Books of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian kings, which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonians, whom he remembereth, than whom doubtless they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priests; who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many fables, and recounted unto strangers the names of many Kings, that never reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, That the magnificent Works, and royal Buildings in Egypt, such as are never found but in States that have greatly flourished, witness that their Princes were of marvelous greatness, and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who believing the manifold and contradictory reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their own names such as pleased them best, have confirmed them, and, as it were, enforced them upon us by their Authority. A third and general cause of more than Egyptian darkness in all ancient Histories, is the Edition of many Authors, by John Annus, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned, I may add mine) I think thus; that Annus having seen some fragments of those Writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true Histories, where approved Writers confirm him; but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to pass, that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie, or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Christian Writers, such as are ancient, for the most part, follow Eusebius: Many late Writers follow the Edition of Annus his Authors: The profane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's reign in Egypt began in the year after the Flood, 191.

To reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings about whom is most controverted, the best mean is by

by help of the Dynasties; of whose continuance, there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Assyrians, Trojans, Italians, &c. and others. The beginning of the 16. Dynastie, is joined by general consent, with 43. year of Ninus; in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, under the twelve which were call'd the greater gods: so that all the years of their continuance were 84. The 13. Dynastie endured 14. years; the fourteenth, 26. the fifteenth, 37. These three last, are said to have been under the three younger gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted 161. years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dynasties, was such as hath been mentioned, because Annus in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reject the account upon this onely reason, that Annus hath it so; considering, that both hitherto, it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid, the reckoning is easily cast; by which the sum of 161. years, which, according to our account, were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the sum of 352. years, which were between the Flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Chams reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear: For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of man-kind which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Anno à Diluvio 131. In building the Tower were consumed 40. years, as Glycas recordeth; whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattel, and Substance through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forests, and Bryers (which the Deluge, and want of culture, in one hundred seventy one years had brought upon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himself in Egypt, we allow twenty years; and these summs being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one years after the Flood, before they arrive at Babel, forty years for their stay there, and twenty for Cham's passage into Egypt, and settling there, make up the sum of 191. years; at which time we find that Cham began his reign in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie.

And to this sum of 191. years, if we add the 161. years of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbred in common account, we shall fall right with the year of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prove that these first Dynasties must needs have been very short, and not containing in the whole sum of their several times above 161. years; Let it suffice, that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt have been peopled as soon as Babel after the Flood, or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinks) must have been before the Flood. That the arival at Babel, was many years before the plantation of Egypt after the Flood, enough hath been said to prove; and that the Dynasties were not before the Flood, the number of the long-lived generations between Adam and the Flood, which was less than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or, if we will think, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynasties, then may this have been as well after the Flood, as before; considering that the Sons of Noah did not in every Countrey erect such form of Policy, as had been used in the same ere the Deluge; but such as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conductor, together with many other circumstances, did induce or enforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather Successions of Regents, oft-times many under one King.

THE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not several races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were, it cannot certainly be warranted. For in refutations of decayed Antiquities, it is more easie to deny than to affirm. But this may be said, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the surest proof, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the Government of the Countrey into the hands of some trusty Counsellor, onely reserving the Sovereignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turks doth to the chief Vizier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore have been successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors, and Regents. Secondly, by custom of such

Princes

Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Abimelech the Philistim, in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol, Captain of his Host; though in taking Abraham's Wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech, the Son of Gideon, it was said: It is not he the Son of Jerubbaal; and Zebul is his Officer; Alfo Ishbosheth, the Son of Saul, feared Abner the Captain of the Host. Yea, David himself hating Joab for his cruelty, did not punish him in regard of his greatness, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite, living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely, as by his own idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burthen of the Government upon others; and upon jealousy, the companion of unworthiness, to have changed his Lieutenants often. Above all other proofs is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph: Only in the Kings Throne will I be above thee: behold, I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt. William Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the year of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eighty, affirms that the like, or very same, form of Government by Viceroy, was in his time practised in Egypt, having there been in use (as he believed) ever since the time of Joseph. He plainly shews, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Countrey, however they have been so deem'd; but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the duty of subjects unto the Caliphs; who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of civil Government, but the power of making War and Peace, with the whole Office and Authority royal, into the Soldans hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphs, or Mulene Ebdadech, with the form of his Court, shall plainly behold the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant; as great in authority as Joseph was, though far inferior in Wisdom.

To think that many names of such Regents, or Lieutenants, as Joseph was, have crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Joseph's brethren call him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrey; besides, it is not unlikely, that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deem him such, under whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royal managing of the State had passed, whilst that the King himself, intending his quiet, had given his Office to another. How flangers have mistaken in this kind, the example already cited of Joseph's brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus; each of whom, citing their relations, as good Authority, say; Diodorus, and Segestris was the nineteenth King after Aneas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Aneas; which could not have been, if Aneas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many Races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the Kings of so many sundry Linages or sorts of men. Now, by whatsoever means a Dynastie, or Regencie continued; both by his own Family, as being made an hereditary Office; or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is, that was the Kings gift and free choice, that gave the Office. But the Crown royal always passed by descent, and not by election; which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph bought all the Land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crown had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby, either have been intralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor; or enjoying their fathers Land, though not his Estate, have been more mighty than the King: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the King himself their Tenant. Likewise we find in Exod. 12. that God spote the first-born of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Ezay, it is said of Pharaoh, I am the Son of Esa. 19. the ancient King.

§. IV.

of Cham, and his Son Mizraim, or Osiris.

THAT the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chenevres, now it is sheweth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture the Land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the Posterity of Cham did reign there, but for that himself did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I think it is no where found, that the Countries of Chush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himself the eldest Son of Cham, saying, Atsi pater Saturnus deorum omnium junior: alio Sum Saturni filius antiquior, german ex pulchro & generoso ortum; which must needs be understood of Cham; for this Saturnus Aegyptius was Cham: A a 2

by help of the Dynasties; of whose continuance, there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Agyptians, Trojans, Italians, &c. and others. For, whereas Engenius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid, the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summ of 161. years, which, according to our account, were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the summ of 322. years, which were between the Flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Chams reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather Successions of Regents, oft-times many under one King.

THe short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not several races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were, it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitutions of decayed Antiquities, it is more easie to deny than to affirm. But this may be said, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the surest proof, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the Government of the Country into the hands of some trusty Counsellor, onely reserving the Sovereignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turks doth to the chief Vizier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Osiris, or Mizraim; and must therefore have been successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors, and Regents. Secondly, by custom of such

Prince.

Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Abimelech the Philistin, in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol, Captain of his Host; though in taking Abraham's Wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech, the Son of Gideon, it was said: Is not he the Son of Jerubbaal? and Zebul is his Officer? Also Ishbosheth, the Son of Saul, feared Abner the Captain of the Host. Yea, David himself hating Joab for his cruelty, did not punish him in regard of his greatness, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite, living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely, both by his own idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burthen of the Government upon others; and upon jealousy, the companion of unworthiness, to have changed his Lieutenants often. Above all other proofs is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph; Only in the Kings Throne will I be above thee: behold, I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt. William Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the year of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eighty, affirms that the like, or very same, form of Government by Viceroy, was in his time practised in Egypt, having there been in use (as he believed) ever since the time of Joseph. He plainly sheweth, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Country, however they have been so deemed; but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the duty of subjects unto the Caliphe; who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charges, not onely of civil Government, but the power of making War and Peace, with the whole Office and Authority royal, into the Soldans hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Mouleme Ebnadech, with the form of his Court, shall plainly behold the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Joseph was, though far inferior in Wisdom.

To think that many names of such Regents, or Lieutenants, as Joseph was, have crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Joseph's brethren call him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Country; besides it is not unlikely, that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deem him such, under whole hand all dispatches of importance, and royal managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himself, intending his quiet, had given his Office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kind, the example already cited of Joseph's brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus; each of whom, citing their relations, as good Authority, say; Diodorus and Scopis was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas; which could not have been, if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many Races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the Kings of so many sundry Languages or sorts of men. Now, by whatsoever means a Dynastie, or Regency continued; whether in one Family, as being made an hereditary Office; or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is, that was the Kings gift and free choice, that gave the Office. But the Crown royal always passed by descent, and not by election; which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph bought all the Land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crown had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby, either have been intralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor; or enjoying their fathers Land, though not his Estate, have been more mighty than the King: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the King himself their Tenant. Likewise we find in Exod. 12. that God suete the first-born of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Ejais, it is said of Pharaoh, I am the Son of &c. 19. the ancient King.

§. IV.

of Cham, and his Son Mizraim, or Osiris.

THAT the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture the Land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the Posterity of Cham did reign there, but for that himself did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I think it is no where found, that the Countries of Chubb, Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himself the eldest Son of Cham, saying, Mibi pater Saturnus deorum omnium junior: alio, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum; which must needs be understood of Cham; for this Saturnus Aegyptius was Cham:

as it is said, that on the Monument of Nimis was an Inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturus Aegyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not far from Egypt, doth testify, that Ham reigned in those parts: And S. Hieron. in quoniam Hebraeis, faith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his days, call their Country Ham; as in four several places in the Palms this Country is called the Land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Isis, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this Country of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia, ut puto (faith he) a Chamo Nōs filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Aegyptum usque hodie Aegyptiorum lingua Kam vocatur, that Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Cham's reign, the same reasons may suffice to be alleged, which I have already given in proof of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange, that the reign of Cham should last so long, as 161. years; considering that sem lived 600. Apophad and Shelab each above 400. But strange it should be; if one Salus created by Mancho, had in those long-lived generations reigned there 19. years, and with Esor, Archus, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris, Orus, and Scaphis. Reineccius in Histor. Julia, placeth Atrazaim next, otherwise called Osiris, according to Diodorus; who, faith he, was the Son of Hammon: Krentzbenius faith, that Atrazaim and Osiris, are words of near affinity and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Atrazaim the Son of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reineccius, citing good authority in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their own language, Ateze. Neither do I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Atrazaim. It is more necessary, and hard to them manifestly, how long Atrazaim or Osiris, reigned. For whereas the year of his death is no where precisely set down, we must be fain to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Annus his Berosus, to have begun his reign at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebes began, it appeareth, first, by the authority of Eusebius, who avoucheth as much; next, by Diodorus, who faith, that he inhabited Thebes; which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie, I can well believe; assenting so far to Reineccius, who thinks the Dynasties were named only, according to the several seats of the Kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reign ended; and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the Son of Osiris.

THE death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirm. The only conjecture that I know is made thus: Lebabin the Son of Atrazaim, called Hercules Tybins, made war in Italy, to revenge his fathers death on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. year of Baleus King of Affria; before which year he had made many great wars in Egypt, Phoenicia, Tygris, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, & Spain; and having ended his Egyptian Wars, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus far Berosus, or Autobus following Berosus. That Orus, last of all the gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdom of Isir, Diodorus Siculus plainly faith, and Plutarch as much, to which all Historians agree. Krentzbenius hereupon infers, that his years may be allowed to the Wars, which Hercules made in so many countries, after the Egyptian Wars were ended: so should the death of Osiris have been the 34. of Baleus, when himself had reigned 297. years. I think that Krentzbenius was a greater Scholar than Souldier. For surely, in those days, when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a far longer time would have been required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time, though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent; which was (doubtless) to find the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had been the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel have come into Egypt but 7. years before the death of Osiris; and have lived there in the reign of Typhon: A thing not easily believed. For it was the same King who advanced Joseph, had him send for his father, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his fathers Funeral; as may easily be gathered out of the Book of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reign of Osiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the 7. year of Israel's coming into Egypt, we must needs cut off 23. years from that number, which Krentzbenius conjectures his reign to have continued; namely, even which he should have lived after Jacob's coming into Egypt; nine, in which Joseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming; and other seven, in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Joseph's advancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Tybins his Wars. For the War which Hercules made in Italy, is said to have indured ten years: After which proportion, we may well give not only six years, as Krentzbenius doth, but 23. more to so many Wars, in so many, and so far distant countries, as are named before; yea, by this proportion, we may attribute unto Orus the 12. years, which passed between the time of Joseph's being sold into Egypt, unto his advancement, considering that Potiphar, who bought him, and whose daughter he may seem to have married, continued all that while chief Steward unto Pharaoh: a thing not likely to have been, if so violent alterations had happened the whilest in Egypt, as the tyrannous usurpation of Typhon multiplies needs have brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old Author, I should confidently say, that Potiphar, for his faithfulness to Orus the Son of Osiris, was by him, in the beginning of his reign, made his chief Steward; at which time, buying Joseph, and finding him a just man, and one under whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Joseph's hands, than unto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either fall-hearted, or weak and unlucky in the troublesome days of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps, I might proceed further, and say, That when the laying of Joseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his servants; then Potiphar, Priest of On, being chief Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Joseph the ancient graces of God, and his injurious imprisonment; whereupon he gave him his Daughter to Wife; and being old, resigned his Office of chief Steward unto him, who afterward, in regard of Potiphar, did favour the Priests, when he bought the Lands of all other Egyptians. This might appear to some a tale not unlike the Friarly book of Agnath, Potiphar's Daughter; but, unto such as consider that God works usually by means; and that Potiphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died; it would seem a matter more probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the Wars of Hercules, in which, by this reckoning, he should have spent 42. years after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian Wars considered, and his former enterprises and achievements proportioned to them) doth not make against us, yet could it for so, if it were against us, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the indisputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Nevertheless, I freely grant, that all these proofs are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscenity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Aegyptus, Orus, and the two Scoliores, successively reigning after Mizraim; and of divers Errors about the former Scoliores.

CONCERNING the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelator giveth three years to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proof, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable, alleging no witness, but as it were, saying, style me ipso; yet herein we may think him to speak probably, for as much as the learned Krentzbenius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soon undertake his fathers revenge; and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other Wars in the same quarrel; as hath been shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzbenius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon; yet, seeing Arctinus, a follower of Berosus, hath it so, I will also believe it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, 7. years were spent, howsoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzbenius only, who placeth the beginning of Orus seven years after the death of Osiris; forgetting to set down his reasons, which in a matter so probable, I think he wanted not. Now, whereas he alloweth 90. years of the 18. Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus; it seems that the reign of Orus lasted 115. years. From the death of Orus, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed 122. years by our account; who (according to Berosus and others) think that Abraham was born in the 130. year of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus: From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham 352
From that Evocation of Abraham 75 time to the departure out of Egypt 430 Summa 857

which sum divers other ways may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there do remain (as is aforesaid) only 122. years from the death of Orus; we are now to consider, how many of them are now to consider, how many of them are to be allowed unto Scaphis, or Scaphis, who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholistics Apollonius without good probability. For this great King or Conquerour, querour, is by many Histories recorded to have over-run a great part of Aſia; to have built a fleet of Ships on the Red Sea: and so to have entred into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle Earth Seas, to have passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Justine, erring in account of his time, calleth Vexoris; for Justine placeth Vexoris in Ages before Ninus; whereby it would follow that seſoftris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient then was Ofiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is, that after the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Aſia) till the father-in-law of Solomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, took Gerar, and gave it to his Daughter (as we may read more at large in the holy History of the Bible) after which time, seſe oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho fought passage through the Land of Iſrael, when he made his Expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres, and Necho, it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King seſoftris. Of seſe, it is doubted by some, for as much as he came into Judea with a great Army. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided; unless it be sufficient proof of his own opinion, that he himself placeth seſoftris next to Orus, following the Scoliaſtes Apollonii. But further answer may be made, to shew that they were not one. For, as Justine witnesseth, seſoftris, otherwise Vexoris, made War on people far removed, abstaining from his neighbours. seſe came up purposely against Hierusalem. seſoftris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. Horse, seſe had 60000. seſoftris had 8020. Chariots, seſe 1200. seſoftris made his Expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name: seſe, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succour Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reign; whom he had favoured even against Solomon: therefore seſoftris must needs have reigned whilst Iſrael abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzheimus collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus; because those Historians affirm that he reigned next after the gods; it moveth me nothing. For Ofiris did succeed those fifteen gods; namely, the twelve greater, and three lesser; himself also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Meneus, and Menis, were titles of Dignity; though mistaken by some, as proper names. Krentzheimus doth very probably gather, that Menus was Mercennius Ter-maximus, the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician; which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Ofiris, who was a great Conqueror, Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankind, by giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowess and great undertakings, seſoftris was no whit inferior to Ofiris: For he fought victory not for gain, but honour only; and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royal disposition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return, he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which he was, being by his own brother purposely fired; which nevertheless, he is said to have escaped, and to have reigned in all 30. years: after which time, he chose rather to die than to live; because he fell blind. Both Herodotus and Diodorus affirm, that seſoftris left a Son, whose name was Pheron, or Pherones; who afterwards took the name of seſoftris, but was nothing like to his father in glory; for he shortly fell blind. The cause of his blindness, Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the River Nilus with a Javelin; which tale Diodorus having likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying, that perhaps he took the disease naturally from his father. How long this man reigned, it is no where expressed; yet, for as much as Orus the second (otherwise Eufiris) who succeeded him, began 14. years after that this seſoftris had been King, it must needs be that this reigned 14. years at least. That Eufiris began not untill these 14. years at least were expired, the very account of time from the first Eufiris, to the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, plainly shews, being almost generally agreed upon, to have been 75. years. That none came between seſoftris the second, and Eufiris, or Orus the second, it stands only upon probabilities, which are these: After seſoftris had reigned some while, he fell blind; after certain years, he recovered his sight, as is said, which may have been true, but is more like to have been a Fable; surely the manner of his recovery, as it is set down, is very fabulous; namely, that by looking upon a woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had only known her own husband, he got his sight again. As the time of his reign, before his blindness, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14. years: so his works, which were great, do much more strongly argue, that his reign was not very short. His works are largely set down by Herodotus and Diodorus; a part of which may seem to have been the finishing of that which his father had begun, about the channels and fluces of Nilus; whom, I think, he rather frighted (as his father had done) with Spades and Shovels, than with Darts and Javelins; and by his diligent oversight of that work, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples love; whom his father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Eufiris, the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor, Queen Thermutis that took up Moles out of the Water.

AND herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Eufiris, who was afterwards King, is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the Son of Solomon. For that Eufiris himself was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the children of Iſrael in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great seſoftris, as Jeroboam was by Solomon, in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to work his greatness with the King by industry; and afterward with the people, by incensing them against their new King, as Jeroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at another; unless he have either an equal spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he fought to derive all the pain and labour of publick works from the Egyptians to the Israelites: he surely did that to his own people which was very plausible; who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the Kings cruelty. Now, that Orus the second, or Eufiris, was the King that first oppressed Iſrael, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten Months: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned Writers; who also think that hereupon grew the Fable of Eufiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Joseph, was a King of a new Family. That Eufiris was of a new Family, Reineccius doth shew; who also thinks him an Author of the bloody Edict. Nevertheless, true it is, that Eufiris, according to all mens computation, began his reign five years after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more, that the persecution began; which Euting thinks to have lasted 87. years, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindness of seſoftris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Vice-roys in Egypt was; and how great confidence the King did put in them, seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that he brought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the same time, the best of the Land to his own father and brethren for nothing; seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh for bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Joseph, what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger born, lately fetched out of prison, a King well able to have governed himself, would give such trust, and sovereign authority; it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore, perhaps, the King did (as many have done) resign his Kingdom to him, though his reign was not accounted to have begun till the death of seſoftris. But whether Eufiris did usurp the Kingdom, or protraction of the Land by violence; or whether the blind King resigned it, keeping the Title; or whether Eufiris were only Regent whilst the King lived, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) King himself: it might well be said that Pharaoh's Daughter took up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Iſrael; seeing he both at that time was King in effect, and shortly after, King in deed and title both. It were not absurd for us to say, that the blind King seſoftris the second oppressed Iſrael. But, for as much as it may seem that the wicked Tyrant shewed his evil nature, even when he first arose; I think it more likely, that Eufiris did it, using at first the power of a King, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. years which passed between the beginning of seſoftris his reign, and the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, 47. being spent; the 75. which remain, are to be accounted to Eufiris, or Orus the second, and his children. Eufiris himself reigned 30. years, according to Eusebius; whom very many judicious Authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who took Moses out of the Water, is said, by all that I have read, to have reigned 12. years. Her name was Thermutis Pharis, or Anthi, according to Cedrenus: Eusebius calls her Aceris; and out of Artabanns his History, Meris: Joseph calls her both Aceris, and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario, saith, that he was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the Daughter of Amenoph, the Son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken; for the Scriptures call her not Pharaoh's Pharaoh's Son's Daughter, but Pharaoh's Daughter. Amenophis indeed, is set next before Eufrius, or Orus the second, by Eusebius and others; but whether he were a King, or only a Regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians, name the Son of Sesoftris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis; and his Daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Niece or Grand-child, than the Daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesoftris; and the dis-reputation of his Son. If so, and if that Eufrius, or Orus the second, marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our conjecture strengthened, and then was the both Daughter, Grand-child, and Wife unto Pharaoh; and surviving him, Queen of the Land, 12. years. But if he were Daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whose conjecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seem, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis; and what King it was, under whom Moses was born; and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

He had two brethren; the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is only named by Eusebius; but his lineage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris, after his sisters death, reigned nine years; after whom Cheneres, thought to be his Son, reigned ten years, and then perished in the Red Sea. During the reign of Cheneres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io; of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Cheneres (whom some call Acencheres, but all, or most do stile Δαμαρ, or, a fighter against God) Acheres reigned 8. years; and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from Father to Son. In the 11. year of Cherres, it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely; viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea; else could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his Posterity, seems to have taken all from Cherres, the Grand-child of Cheneres. For whereas Armais is said to have reigned four years after Cherres; and Armefis one after Armais; these two Kings are by Eusebius and others, accounted as one, and his reign said to have been five years. His name is called Armenus, otherwise Danaus; and his Pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Histor. Julia.

Egyptus or Ramefles, who gave name to the Country, having expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lyncus, married to Hypermetra.

Danaus or Armenus, expelled by his brother Egyptus, after he had reigned five years, became King of Argos in Greece: was father to Hypermetra.

How it might come to pass, that the Nephews Sons of Epaphus should have occupied the Kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say; considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius, to have been born in the time of Cheneres. But for as much as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diversely related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danaus and Egyptus, otherwise called Armenus and Ramefles, was equally distant from Eufrius, or Orus the second, with Cherres the Grand-child of Cheneres. And that the Posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the History of these two brethren, Danaus and Egyptus; of whom the former had fifty Daughters, the latter fifty Sons; perhaps, or rather questionless, by divers women; yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoever it were, the general consent of Writers is, that Armenus, or Danaus, did succeed Cherres; and (according to Eusebius, and good Authors approving him) reigned five years. Ramefles followed, who reigned 68. years. This Ramefles, or Egyptus, is that Armefesimamum, or Armefesimamum, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born; and the cruel Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reign seems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For, whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same King under whom Moses was born, and under whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40. year of his age; and fled into the wilderness, ness, and there abode for fear; all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Ramefles, who reigned so long; wherefore, desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common Errour, he placeth one Alisfragmutibosis (whose name is found in the List of Egyptian Kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an Age 112. or 113. years, more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his Successors from Themos (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downwards, with no other variation of the length of each man reign than is the difference between Manetho and Eusebius, he finds Moses born under Armefesimamum, and Isaac delivered in the days of his Son Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmutibosis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharater, of which name one was thought to have flourished, either as a King, or a wife Man, about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmutibosis to Phragmutibosis, Pharmutibosis, or Pharater, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent

Learning and Industry; and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable Works: yet my silent herein is withheld from him by these Reasons. First, I see all other Writers agree, that Cheneres was King, who was drowned in the Red Sea. Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. All are dead, &c. may better be understood of Eufrius, and all his children, than of one King alone. Thirdly, S. Cyril in his first Book against Julian the Apostate, saith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. years old, which was this Armefesimamum, being then King of Egypt. After Ramefles, Amenophis reigned 19. years; who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the Red Sea; of which our Opinion being already laid open, I think it most expedient to refer the Kings ensuing to their own times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; which for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-pass.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses Birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

True it is, that the History it self is generally and well known; yet concerning the time of Moses his Birth, who was the excellent and famous Instrument of this, and other great Works of the Highest, the different opinions are very near as many, as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives, in his Annotations upon S. Augustine, cites very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyry out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis; But, if he did mean the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit; for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories, divine and humane; while that Semiramis lived, she continued Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely; neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in verum natura.

A second Opinion he remembereth out of Apion, taken from Ptolemy, a Priest of Mendes, who saith, that Moses was born while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Amesies in Egypt.

The third Opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greek History, the first Book; that Moses was born while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Allyrinus, who, though he cite some Authorities, that Moses lived after the Trojan war, is himself of opinion, that Moses was far more ancient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth down the testimony of Numenius the Philosopher, who took Musaeus and Moses to be one; confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Musaeus by the Grecians; and who farther delivereth, that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the Daughter of Egyptus; the same which Epulomus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) leth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothet.

Thermuthes. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eusepius, in his first Book, de Doctrina, Moses, vir Deo conmandatus, is called Amenophis Judeorum. Eusebius, in his Chronologie, finds that Moses was born while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Moses birth, Thumosis, or Thmosis: the same, perchance, which Apyon the Grammarians will have to be Amosis, and else-where Amenophis, the father of Sethosis: to whom Lysimachus, and Cornelius Tacitus, gave the name of Bochoris. To me it seems most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus, or Sphereus, governed Affria; Orthopolis, Sigonia; and Criajus the Argives; that then (Sesoftris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was born. For, if we believe Saint Augusine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduxit Moses ex Aegypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium Regis; Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proved, Saint Augusine affirms (as before remembred) that Moses was born, Saphrus governing Affria; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now, Saphrus ruled twenty years; his successor Amelchus thirty years; Spartacus after him forty years: in whole fourth year Cecrops began to govern in Attica: Alcatades followed Spartacus, and held the Empire one and forty years. So as Moses being born while Saphrus ruled Affria; Orthopolis Sigonia, and Criajus Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, saith Saint Augusine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Affrian Saphrus; for take one year remaining of twenty (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which added the thirty years of Amelchus, and the forty years of Spartacus, these make seventy one, with which there were waisted three years of Cecrops his fifty years: then take nine years out of the reign of Alcatades, who was Spartacus successor, thole nine years added to seventy one, make eighty, at which age Moses left Egypt; and added these nine years to the three years of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remain but four years of Cecrops his fifty, and so it falleth right with S. Augusine's words, affirming, that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now, the time in which the Hebrews were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Moses, and fifty four years, or rather more, after Joseph; between whose death, and the birth of Moses, there were consumed sixty four years, some of which time, and eighty years after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For, as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters over them, to keep them under with burthens; and they built the Cities, Pithom and Rameses, &c. And by cruelty, they caused the children of Israel to serve, and made them weary of their lives, by fore labour in Clay and Brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power, and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed; even from fifty four years, or not much more, after the death of Joseph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370. to the eightieth year of Moses, and until he wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan; which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codemus, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be understood, I think it necessary to speak a few words of the principal place therein named in this Discourse.

§. II.

Of divers Cities and Places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or else-where in the Scriptures.

THIS City, which the Hebrews call Zaan, was built seven years after Herem. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes, and so doth Hieronymus; the Septuagint, Tanais; Josephus, Protaitis, Hier. 1. 10. 11. after the name of an Egyptian Queen; Antoninus gives it the name of Thans; Hegeffius, Thamnia; and William Tyrinus, Tapius. It is adjoyneth to the Land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremy the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Jewish Idolatry.

Zaan, or Taphnes, was, in Moses time, the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which they Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did read Astronomy in Heliopolis, or On; to Pharates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus, hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint and the Vulgar Edition, Edition, for Zaan, write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Junius, and our English call it in Egypt, Hierem, On, and Ptolemy, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, toward the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus, falling into the Sea at Pelufium. And it may be, that Heliopolis, to the South of the River Trojan, was the same which Vatablus and our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge; the same which Pomp. Mela and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrinus in the Holy Warr, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simcon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Totiphar Priest, or Prince, whose Daughter Joseph married. In the Territory adjoining Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the High Priest of the Jews, built a Temple, dedicated to the Eternal God; not much inferior to that of Hierusalem (Ptolemy Philopater, then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian, 333. years after the foundation by Onias, whom Josephus falsely reporteth herein, to have fulfilled a Prophecie of Ejaf, Chap. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terre Egypti; in that day shall the Altar of the Lord be in the midst of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes, at the time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Jesus remained, while Joseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: near which (saith Brochard) the Fountain is still found, called Jesus Well, whose streams do afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his Description of Egypt.

There is also in that City of Noph, remembred by Ejaf and Ezechiel, the same which Hofea the Prophet calleth Atoph; with later name it took from a Mountain adjoining, so called; which Mountain Herodotus remembred. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Mazarr. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr and Tudalensis Miracim.

Pelufium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English, write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Daniata, as Gul. Tyrinus witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelufium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrinus) que olim dicta est Pelufium; Belbeis that in times past was called Pelufium.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Diof, Exec. 30, polis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierem converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Babstus (for so Hierome and Zeigler do write it) is the same which the Hebrews call Phibeth.

To make the Story more perceivable, I have added a Description of the Land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes, or Zaan, Heliopolis, or Bethsames, Balsophon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Deserts of Arabia the Story. For all Story, without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure, so it no way enrichth the knowledge and understanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serve to retain, what we read, in our memories: so well as these Pictures and Descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digress in many places, and to interpose some such Discourse; otherwise seeming impertinent; taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who, in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum observatione res gestæ narrentur, aut sine Topographiæ cognitione Historiæ legantur, adeo confusa atque perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex his nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit. If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places wherein they were done; or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt; and of Moses his preferation and Education.

BUT to return to the Story it self. It appeareth, that notwithstanding the labour and slavery which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: in so much as Pharaoh, considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Devil, resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soon as they

Pharaoh's Son's Daughter, but Pharaoh's Daughter. Amenophis indeed, is set next before Eufirius, or Orus the second, by Eufebius and others; but whether he were a King, or only a Regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians, name the Son of Sesoftris. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis; and his Daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Niece or Grand-child, than the Daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesoftris, and the dis-reputation of his Son. If so, and if that Eufirius, or Orus the second, marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our conjecture strengthened, and then was the both Daughter, Grand-child, and Wife unto Pharaoh; and surviving him, Queen of the Land, 12. years. But if she were Daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whose conjecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seem, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis; and what King it was, under whom Moses was born; and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

He had two brethren; the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is only named by Eufebius; but his lineage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris, after his sisters death, reigned nine years; after whom Chencher, thought to be his Son, reigned ten years, and then perished in the Red Sea. During the reign of Chencher, Eufebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io; of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencher (whom some call Aenecher, but all, or most do stile Achur), a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. years; and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from Father to Son. In the 11. year of Cherres, it is said by Eufebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely; viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea; else could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his Posterity, seems to have taken all from Cherres, the Grand-child of Chencher. For whereas Armais is said to have reigned 40. years after Cherres; and Armais one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eufebius and others, accounted as one, and his reign said to have been five years. His name is called Armais, otherwise Danaus; and his Pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Histor. Julia.

Telegonus:

Epaphus: Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Eufirius.

Egyptus or Rameffes, who gave name to the Country, having expell'd his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lyncus, married to Hypermetira.

Danaus or Armeus, expelled by his brother Egyptus, after he had reigned five years, became King of Argos in Greece: was father to Hypermestra.

How it might come to pass, that the Nephews Sons of Epaphus should have occupied the Kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say; considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eufebius to have been born in the time of Chencher. But for as much as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diversly related by Eufebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danaus and Egyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameffes, was equally distant from Eufirius, or Orus the second, with Cherres the Grand-child of Chencher. And that the Posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the History of these two brethren, Danaus and Egyptus; of whom the former had fifty Daughters, the latter fifty Sons; perhaps, or rather questionable, by divers women; yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoever it were, the general consent of Writers is, that Armeus, or Danaus, did succeed Cherres; and (according to Eufebius, and good Authors approving him) reigned five years. This Rameffes, or Egyptus, is that Armeffemianum, or Armeffianum, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born; and the cruel Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reign seems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For, whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same King under whom Moses was born, and under whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40. year of his age; and fled into the wilderness, ness, and there abode for fear: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameffes, who reigned so long; wherefore, desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common Error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the List of Egyptian Kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an Age 112. or 113. years, more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his Successors from Themos (whom Eufebius calls Amasis) downwards, with no other variation of the length of each mans reign than is the difference between Mantho and Eufebius, he finds Moses born under Armeffianum, and Israel delivered in the days of his Son Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seems to him with little alteration to found like Pharater, of which name one was thought to have flourished, either as a King, or a wife Man, about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Pharater, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent

Learning and Industry; and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable Works: yet my assent herein is withheld from him by these Reasons. First, I see all other Writers agree, that Chencher was King, who was drowned in the Red Sea. Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. All are dead, &c. may better be understood of Eufirius, and all his children, than of one King alone. Thirdly, S. Cyril in his first Book against Julian the Apostate, saith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. years old, which was this Armeffianum, being then King of Egypt. After Rameffes, Amenophis reigned 19. years; who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the Red Sea; of which our Opinion being already laid open, I think it most expedient to refer the Kings ensuing to their own times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; which for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-pass.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses Birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

True it is, that the History itself is generally and well known; yet concerning the time of Moses his Birth, who was the excellent and famous Instrument of this, and other great Works of the Highest, the different opinions are very near as many as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives, in his Annotations upon S. Augustine, cites very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sancheiata, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis: But, if he did mean the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit; for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories, divine and humane; while that Semiramis lived, the commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely; neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in verum natura.

A second Opinion he remembereth out of Apion, taken from Ptolemy, a Priest of Alexander, who saith, that Moses was born while Isachius did rule the Argives, and Amesius in Egypt.

The third Opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greek History, the first Book; that Moses was born while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Affyrinus, who, though he cite some Authorities, that Moses lived after the Trojan war, is himself of opinion, that Moses was far more ancient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth down the testimony of Naminius the Philosopher, who took Amisus and Moses to be one; confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Amisus by the Grecians; and who farther delivereth, that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis the Daughter of Egypt; the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermuthes.

B b

thermother, Eufebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus, in his first Book, de Iudæa, Moses, vir Deo coniunctissimus, is called Museus Iudeorum. Eufebius, in his Chronologie Iudæ, that Moses was born while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Moses birth, Thumosis, or Thomosis: the same, perchance, which Aption the Grammarians will have to be Amosis, and else-where Amenophis, the father of Sethosis: to whom Ephraim, and Cornelius Tacitus, gave the name of Bocchoris. To me it seems most probable, that while Sapirus, called also Spherus, or Iphereus, governed Affria; Orthopolis, Sicynia; and Criafus the Argives; that then (Sesoftris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was born. For, if we believe Saint Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eusebius Moses ex Ægypto populum Dei novissimum tempore Cecrops Atticæ gentis Regis; Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians.

Aug. 18.

2514.

In this fort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proved. Saint Augustine affirms (as before remembered) that Moses was born, Sapirus governing Affria; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now, Sapirus ruled twenty years; his successor Amelchus thirty years; Spareus after him forty years: in whose fourth year Cecrops began to govern in Attica: Alcatades followed Spareus, and held the Empire one and forty years. So as Moses being born while Sapirus ruled Affria; Orthopolis, Sicynia, and Criafus Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, saith Saint Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Affrian Sapirus; for take one year remaining of twenty (for so long Sapirus reigned) to which add the thirty years of Amelchus, and the forty years of Spareus, these make seventy one, with which there were wasted three years of Cecrops his fifty years: then take nine years out of the reign of Alcatades, who was Spareus successor, those nine years added to seventy one, make eighty, at which age Moses left Egypt; and add these nine years to the three years of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remain but four years of Cecrops his fifty, and so it falleth right with S. Augustine's words, affirming, that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now, the time in which the Hebrews were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Moses, and fifty four years, or rather more, after Joseph; between whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed sixty four years, some of which time, and eighty years after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For, as it is written in Exo. 12. 41. 42. They set task-masters over them, to keep them under with burthens; and they built the Cities, Pithom and Rameses, &c. And by cruelty, they caused the children of Israel to serve, and made them weary of their lives; by sore labour in Clay and Brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power, and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed; even from fifty four years, or not much more, after the death of Joseph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370. to the eightieth year of Moses, and untill he wrought his miracles in the field of Joan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codemann, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be understood, I think it necessary to speak a few words of the principal place therein named in this Discourse.

§. II.

Of divers Cities and Places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or else-where in the Scriptures.

This City, which the Hebrews call Joan, was built seven years after Hebron. Ezechiel calleth it Taphnes, and so doth Hieronymus; the Septuagint, Tanis; Josephus, Frontidis, after the name of an Egyptian Queen; Antonius gives it the name of Thanis; Hegeppus, Thauma; and William Tyrinus, Tapis. It adjoineth to the Land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremy the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Jewish Idolatry.

Joan, or Taphnes, was, in Moses time, the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Artaemus affirmeth, that Abraham did read Astronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus, hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. Edition, for Joan, write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Uatubus; Junius, and our English call it On; and Ptolemie, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, toward the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus, falling into the Sea at Pelufium. And it may be, that Heliopolis, to the South of the River Trojan, was the same which Uatubus and our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge; the same which Pomp. Mela and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrinus in the Holy Warr, Malbec; the Arabians, Babalbeth; and Simcon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Potiphar Priest, or Prince, whose Daughter Joseph married. In the Territory adjoining, Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the High Priest of the Jews, built a Temple, dedicated to the Eternal God; not much inferior to that of Hierusalem (Ptolemy Philopater, then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Festus, 233. years after the foundation by Onias, whom Josephus falsely reporteth herein, to have fulfilled a Prophecie of Esay, Chap. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terre Egypti; In that day shall the Altar of the Lord be in the midst of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanius, at the time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Jesus remained, while Joseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Hered: near which (saith Brochard) the Fountain is still found, called Jesus Well, whose streams do afterward water the Gardens of Balamun, no where else found in Egypt. And here- of see more in Brochard, in his Description of Egypt.

There is also in that City of Noph, remembered by Esay and Ezechiel, the same which Hofea the Prophet calleth Aloph; which later name it took from a Mountain adjoining, so called; which Mountain Herodotus remembereth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Atazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalenus Atzarum.

Pelufium, which Uatubus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English, write Sin; the Septuagint call Sait; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrinus witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelufium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrinus) que olim dicta est Pelufium; Belbeis that in times past was called Pelufium.

The City of Nô, the Septuagint call Diof. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Babustus (for so Hierome and Zeigler do write it) is the same which the Hebrews call Urepheth.

To make the Story more perceivable, I have added a Description of the Land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembered in the Scripture: as of Taphnes, or Joan, Heliopolis, or Bethsames, Balophon, Saccath, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Deserts of Arabia the Story. For all Story, without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure, so it no way enricheth the knowledge and understanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serve to retain, what we read, in our memories; so well as these Pictures and Descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digress in many places, and to interpose some such Discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent; taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who, in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum observatione res gestæ narrentur, aut sine Topographiæ cognitione Historiæ legantur, adeo confusa atque perturbata crunt omnia, ut ex iis nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elicì possit; If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places wherein they were done; or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt; and of Moses his preservation and Education.

But to return to the Story it self. It appeareth, that notwithstanding the labour and slavery which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: in so much as Pharaoh, considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perilous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Devil, resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Seplora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, que precrant (saith Comestor) multitudini obsecravit, who had command given them over all Mid-wives; by whom (as it seemeth) he gave order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For, to have called all the Mid-wives of Egypt together, had been a strange Parliament. Now, whether these two (before named) were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diversly disputed. S. Augusline calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exodus 1. The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Josephus, Abulenlis, and Peterius believe them to be Egyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the World might witness both the wickedness of the Egyptians, and the just cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding these Women filled with piety, and the fear of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children born within his Dominions.

Now, besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affording them the justice which every King oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might have employed, or sent away, at his pleasure; Josephus giveth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be born a child, who growing to mansestate, should become a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To prevent which (and presuming that he could resist the Ordinance of God, by a mean, contrary to the Laws of Heaven and of Nature) he stretched out his bloody and merciless hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spiritual Kingdom of Christ, as if it should have been temporal, he caused all the male children at that time born, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kind of foreknowledge of the future success, it may be gathered by his own words, in the tenth Verse of the fifth of Exodus: Come, let us work wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to pass, that if there be War, they join themselves also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it us from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their own most feeble, and altogether darkened, understanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved daughter of this Tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods marvellous works taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Ark of Reeds, a sucking and powerless Infant. And this Prince having beheld the child his form and beauty, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as she did not only preserve it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her own, and with equal care to the Son of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deed, she called the child Moses, as it were, extra ductus, or erectus, taken out, to wit, out of the Water; or after Josephus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expressing Water, and Hiser, as much as to say, as that which is drawn out of Water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised before he was put into the Ark of Reeds, and that Amram his father had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge of Pharaohs Daughter, and by men of the most understanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educavit, precessit ei sapientibus Aegyptiorum Magistris, a quibus erudiretur, saith Besli, unto whom she gave Princely education, appointing over him wise Masters of the Egyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Josephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth: And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which Wisdom or Sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senecus hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moses, and the reign of Josia.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain antient Historians of his war in Ethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his judgment of his Pastoral life; and that of Peterius of the Books of Genesis and Job.

When Moses was grown to mans estate, Josephus and Enchirius, out of Artapanus, tell us of ten years War that he made against the Ethiopians; of the besieging of Seba, afterward, by Cambyses, called Meroe; and how he recovered the City by the favour of Tharbis, a Daughter of Ethiopia, whom he took to Wife. So hath Comestor a pretty tale of Moses, how after the end of that War, Tharbis resisting his return into Egypt, Moses, most skilful in Astronomy, caused two Images to be engraven in two precious Stones, whereof the one increased memory; the other caused forgetfulness: These he set in two Rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his Wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memory for himself; which Ring of forgetfulness, after she had a while worn, the began to neglect the love she bare her Husband: and so Moses, without danger, returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the fortieth year of Moses age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrews, moved by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soon after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence, he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whose chosen servant he was, he fled into Arabia Petrea, the next bordering Countrey to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times, were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly means) to make the watering of a few sheep, and the assisting of the Daughter of Raguel the Madianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a Wife of one of those, and a father-in-law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Countrey nearest Egypt, fittest to return from; necessary to be known, because inter-jacent between Egypt and Judaea, through which he was to lead the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented best served. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Desarts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings Son, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs Daughter, but as a meek and humble Shepherd, sitting at a mountains foot, a keeper and commander of those poor Beasts only.

In that part of Arabia near Madian, he consumed 40. years; and though (as Philo in the Story of Moses life observeth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desert, he enjoyed himself; and being separate from the preals of the world, and the troublesome affairs thereof, he gave himself to contemplation, and to make perfect in himself all those knowledges, whereof his younger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author all judging that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith Plato) ars Pastoralis, quasi praeludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quoniam admodum bellicosorum ingenia praerexerunt se in venationibus, experientia inseritis, quod posita in militia, & bello perfecta sunt; brutis praebentibus materiam exercitii, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero praefectura mansueti pecoris habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoque Reges cognominantur Pastores populi, non contrumelias, sed honoris gratia. The art of keeping sheep is, as it were, an introductory exercise unto a Kingdom, namely, the rules over men, the most gentle flock: Even as warlike natures do before-hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wild beasts those things which after they will accomplish in warfare: these brute beasts affording matter, wherein to train themselves, both in time of war and of peace. But the government of gentle cattle, hath a kind of resemblance unto a Kingly rule over subjects; therefore Kings are stiled Shepherds; of the people, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moses, in the time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Book of Job, as Peterius supposeth, I cannot judge of it, because it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I subscribe to Peterius opinion, That Moses, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the Book of Genesis; although I cannot deny the reason of Peterius conjecture, That by the example of Jobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrews; and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their delivery from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plenty, promised.

Of his calling back into Egypt by the Angel of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to persuade Pharaoh, that he was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteen Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needless. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught of God, by what name he should make him known, and by whom he was sent; he

he received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being Nature. Out of which he delivered him in the first part of his Answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest; and in his second, to be understood by all. For, there is nothing that is or hath being of it self, but the Eternal; which truly is, which is above all, which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment; their substance walteth, and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same, in every shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. Una est Dei, & sola natura que verè est: id enim quod subsistit non habet aliud, sed ipsum est. Cetera que creata sunt, citius videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursus non esse, quod non fuit; It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himself, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seem to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not; and that which hath not been, may again want being. And with this, in respect of the divine Nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura umbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull: in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are nothing, less than nothing, and meer vanity.

Of the ten Plagues wherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by changing the Rivers into bloud; God punishing them by those waters, into which their forefathers had thrown, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the water say, Lord, thou art just, which art, and which wast; and holy, because thou hast judged these things; for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets; and therefore hast thou given them bloud to drink.

The rest of the Plagues by Frogs, Lice, Flies, or stinging Waips; by the death of their Cattel; by leprous Scabs; by Hail and Fire; by Grasshoppers; by Darknes; after which, Pharaoh forbade Moses his presence: moved the hardened heart of the unbelieving King, no longer than the pain and peril lasted; till such time as his own first-born, and the first-born of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his own life (a time wherein we remember God perforce) stood upon no condition; whereas before, he first yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reserving their bestial; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his own people: of which (the fear being past) he suddenly repented him, as his pursuit after them proved. For, when every one of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moses received) slain a Lamb, without spot or blemish, for the Passover (a Sacrament of the most clean and unspotted Saviour) and with the blood thereof coloured the post and lintern of the doors; the Angel of God in the night more every first-born of Egypt, from the Son of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible judgment of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did, in after-times, imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites used after the Passover; ascribing an exceeding virtue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not only mark their Sheep and Cattel, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserve them from lightning, and other harms.

§. V.

Of Pharaoh's pursuit of the Israelites; and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so far as Succoth.

Now, when the people were removed, and on their way (his heart being hardened by God) he bethought him as well of the honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoils of his people, and in despite of himself. And having before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readines, he consulted with himself, what way the Israelites were like to take. He knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Countrey of the Philistines. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and (in all probability) of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to find some other out-let, to wit, through the Defart of Etham; and there, because the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, he thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape him that that way. In the mean while, having gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and six hundred of his own, and Captains over them; he determined to set upon them in the plains of Gosen, which way sooner they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharp hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kind of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Britains used against the Romans, while they made the War for the conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh's, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to assail the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrews might join themselves to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, enforced him, at this time, to give an assent to their departure; perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josephus partial in this affair, yet, by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haste. For Moses made but three days march, ere Pharaoh was at his heels; and yet the last day, he went on 16. miles: which in so hot a Countrey, and to drive their Cattel and Sheep with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march winderling the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his enterprizes; so he lay not still in the ditch, crying for help, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed becoming a wife man, and a valiant and skillfull Conductor; as by all his actions and counsels, from this day to his death, well appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israhel of the Taffover, he appointed a general Assembly, or Rendez-vous of all the Hebrews at Ramesses, in the Territory of Gosen; a City standing indifferently to receive from all parts of the Countrey, the dispersed Hebrews; and gave commandment; that every Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dough, and Paste, not staying to make it into Bread; knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharaoh's Horse-men and Chariots, of which kind of defence Moses was utterly unprovided (though, as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Ramesses East-ward, towards the Defarts of Etham, and encamped at Succoth; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the Month Abib; which Month, from that time forward, they were commanded to account as the first Month of the year. Whether in former times they had been accustomed to begin their year in some other Month, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now re-called by Moses to the rule of their fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained another beginning of their Politick year, which was not now abrogated, but rather, by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, unto the beginning, middest, or ending of the year; that distinction of the Sacred and the Politick year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of days in every Month, and the whole form of their year, like enough it is, that Moses himself in fourty years space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust; but that any rule of framing their Kalender was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now, because time and motion begin together, it will not, I think, be any great breach of order, to shew here, at their first setting forth, what was the form of the Hebrew year; with the difference between them and other Nations, in ordering the account of time.

Of the Solar and Lunar years; and how they are reconciled; with the form of the Hebrew year, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Moneths are thus named.

The First Moneth, Nisan , or Abib .	1. March.
II. Jar , or Tiar , Zio , or Zin .	2. April.
III. Sivan , or Sinan , or Siban .	3. May.
IV. Tamuz .	4. June.
V. Ab .	5. July.
VI. Ebul .	6. August.
VII. Tifri , or Ethavin , or Ethanim .	7. September.
VIII. Marebshan , or Mechashan , or Bul , or with Josephus , Merfonane .	8. October.
IX. Chiffen , or Caffen .	9. November.
X. Tebeth , or Tebeth .	10. December.
XI. Scheth , or Sabath .	11. January.
XII. Adar , and 1st Adar .	12. February.

VE Adar, was an intercalary Moneth, added some years unto the other twelve, to make the Solar and Lunar year agree; which (besides the general inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, because of the divine Precept. For God appointed especial Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the year, and withall on a set day, both of the Moon, and of the Moneth: as the Feast of the First-fruits, the new Moons, and the like; which could not have so been kept, if either the day of the Moon had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it self been found far distant from his place in the season of the year.

Other Nations, the better to observe their Solemnities in the due time, and to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances (which is the principal commodity of time that is, the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their years unequal, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more days, as the error committed in foregoing years required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of days made up a compleat year. For though by the continual course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plain enough, even to the most savage of all people, when a year hath passed over them; yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbered by a shorter tally, makes this long measure of whole years insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therefore men observed the Monethly conspicuous revolution of the Moon, by which they divided the year into twelve parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29. days and nights, and those again into their quarters and hours. But as the marks of time are sensibly and easily discerned; so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the understanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moon, containing less time by 11. days, or thereabout, than the yearly course of the Sun through the Zodiak, in the space of sixteen years, every Moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the year, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to add some days to the year, making it to consist of twelve Moneths, and as many days more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sun determine his yearly revolution by any set number of whole days; neither did the Moon change always at one hour; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to be observed by him, that would seek to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certain rule.

Here lay much Wisdom, and deep Art, which could not soon be brought to perfection. Yet, as making an estimate at random, the Athenians held the year to contain three hundred and sixty days; wherein most of the Greeks concurred with them. That three hundred and sixty days filled up the Grecian year (besides many collateral proofs) it is manifest by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in the honour of Demetrius Phalerus, which were (saith he) 360. whilst as yet the year exceeded not that number of days. By this account, neither did any certain age of the Moon begin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many years in their own places; but must needs be shifted by little and little, from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the days forgotten to be inserted into the Almanack by men, but not forgotten by the superior bodies in their courses, should occupy their own rooms in their due turns. Now, because the solemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moon, and withall, on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombeon (which answereth in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order, that this Moneth might ever begin with the new Moon; which they effected by adding some two days to the last Moneth of every year; those games being held once in four years. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter even; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth year, which was the second of the Moneth Ebedromion (agreeing nearly with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it in their fourth Lunar year, accounting by the Moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of June would every year have grown colder and colder, had they not sought to keep all upright, by intercalating in each other Olympiads, that is, each eighth year, one whole Moneth, which they called the second Pofideon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one Month of 29. days, another of 30. days, &c. so successively through the whole year. Thus, with much labour, they kept their year, as near as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but these marks, which they observed, were found at length to be deceitfull guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth years intercalation, that it should not deceive them in 11. hours and 18. minutes at the least, or some ways in 34. hours and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences, would in few Ages, have bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who, not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth years intercalation, devised a Cycle of 19. years, wherein the Moon, having 235. times ran out her circuit, met with the Sun in the same place, & on the same day of the year; as in the 19. year before past she had done. This invention of Meton, was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called, The Golden Number, which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been used; for by the intercalation of seven Months, in the 19. years, all was so even, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one year could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moons anticipating in one Cycle 7. hours, and some minutes, of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus devised a new Cycle, containing four of Meton's, that is to say, 76. years; and afterwards, Hipparchus, a noble Astrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former Observations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar, was that which Julius Cæsar made, who, by advice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the year unto the form which is now in use with us, containing 365. days and 6. hours, which hours in four years, make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth year, the 24. of February. The correction of the Julian year, by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Dom. 1582. is not as yet entertained by general consent: it was indeed but as a Note added unto the Work of Cæsar, yet a Note of great importance. For whereas it was observed, that the Sun, which at the time of the Nicene Council, An. Dom. 324. entered the Equinoctial on the 21. day of March, was in the year 1582. ten days sooner found, in that time Pope Gregory strook out of the Kalendar ten days, following the 4. of October; so that in stead of the fifth day, was written the fifteenth; by which means the movable Feasts depending on the Sun's entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward, in every hundred year, the Leap-day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred; because the Sun doth not in his yearly course take up full six hours above the 365. days, but rather six many minutes, as in 400. years make about three whole days.

But the Cycle of 29. years, which the Hebrews used, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of hours, minutes, and other lesser fractions to help it; neither did in summing up the days of the whole year, neglect the days of the Moon, confounding one Month with another. For with them it fell out, that always the Kalendar, or first day of the Moneth, was at the new Moon; and because that day was Festival, they were very careful, as well to observe the short year of the Moon, passing through all the 12. Signs in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gave it to Nisan, their first Moneth, which is about our March, or April, 30. days; to Jar, their second Moneth 29. days; and so successively 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to pass, that every two Moneths of theirs contain'd somewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moon, allowing 29. days 12 hours, and odd minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous, or Epacl days, which made up seven Moneths in 19. years; so fix of which seven were commonly given 30. days, to one of them 29. days, or otherwise, as was found requisite. Their common year (as appeareth by the several days of each Moneth) contained 354 days, which fall of the year, wherein the Sun finisheth his course, 11. whole days, with some fractions of time. But these days, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19. years, were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of the Cycle, both the Sun and Moon were found on the same day of the year, Moneth, and week, yea, commonly on the same hour of the day, where they had been at the beginning of it, 19. years before.

Divers have diversly set down the form of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their intercalations. Sigonius tells us, that every second year, they did add a Moneth of 22. days; every fourth year a Moneth of 23. in regard of 11. days and a half wanting in 12. Moons, to fulfill a year of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the Moon doth never finish her course in 22. or 23. days; and therefore to have added so many days to the end of the year, had been the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the years following, which could not have begun, as they ought, with the new Moon. Genebrard saith, that every third year, or second year, as need required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the years end unto the other 12. This I believe to have been true; but in which of the years the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all far from evenness, untill the very last of the 19. years. For (to omit such as erre grossly) some there are who say, that after three years, when besides the days spent in 36. courses of the Moon, 33. days are left remaining, that is, 11. days of each year; then did the Hebrews add a Moneth of 30. days; keeping three days, as it were, in plussage unto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth year; at which time, besides the intercalary Moneth, remained fix days, namely, three surmounting that Month, and the Epact of three years, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they go on to the 18. year; at which time they have 18. days in hand: all which, with the Epact of the 19. year, make up a Moneth of 29. days, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; yet surely it must needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18. year every Moneth were removed from his own place by the distance of 48. days, that is, half a quarter of a year and more; which inconvenience, by such a reckoning, was unavoidable. Wherefore I prefer the common opinion, which prevents such dislocation of the Moneths, by letting down a more convenient way of intercalation in the 8. year. For the 6. days remaining after the two former intercalations made in the third and sixth years, added unto the 22. days, arising out of the Epact of the 7. and 8. years, do fitly serve to make up a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two days is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the year ensuing very the less from the proper season of every Moneth. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and years, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea; and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

From Succoth, in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recover the Mountain foot, by the edge of that Wilderness, though he intended nothing less than to go out of that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Horse-men and armed Chariots that followed him, he kept himself from being encompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia, being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceed from three respects: the first two, natural; the third, divine. For, Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moses took, perswaded himself, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of above a Million, if not of two Millions of Souls (for it is written, Exod. 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly pass over those Desert and high Mountains with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that fastness he should have overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest number of them. For these his own words, They are tangled in the Land, the Wilderness hath shut them in, do shew his hopes and intents; which Moses, by turning another way, did frustrate. Secondly, Moses, by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh toward the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (smitting Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughness of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the Mountain foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the over-bearing violence both of Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the All-powerfull God was such, by whose Spirit, onely wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000. men, to cast the success upon his own understanding, wife conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, sixteen miles distant; and late down between two ledges of Mountains adjoining to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, and Baalzepon towards the South; the same which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple, dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus specula, seu custodia; Lord of the watch-tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at least made their slaves believe, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idol would both arrest them, and force them to return to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turns. Egyptii diis secundi; The Egyptians were fruitful in gods, saith S. Hierom. But Moses, who encamped at the foot of this Mountain with a million of Souls, or, as others conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the Watch-tower asleep, or out of countenance.

Now, these two passages, leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm Land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Cafotie, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judea, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembered, and took the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, between the Mountains, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but got sight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and wall of the Sea; in so much as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaoh's sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutiny, at that time when it behooved them most to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And their fear, which, saith the Book of Wisdom, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despair in God's former Promises, and to be forgetfull of their own strength and multitudes.

§. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea; and of the Red Sea it self.

But Moses, who feared nothing but God himself, perswaded them to be confident in his goodness, who hath never abandoned those, that assuredly trusted in him; using this comfortable and resolved speech: Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians whom ye have seen this day, ye shall never see them again. The Lord shall fight for you. After which, Moses called on God for succour, received encouragement, and commandment to go on, in these words; Wherefore cryest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forwards, and lift thou up thy Rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, and let the children of Israel go on dry ground through the midst of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the dark of the night, finding the sands uncovered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia; two parts of the night being spent ere he entered the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Eastern Wind, and by Moses Rod, to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written: The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behind them; also the Pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behind them; which is, that it pleased God therein, either by his immediate power, or by the ministry of his Angel, to interpose his defence between the Hebrews and their Enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmful speed. But in the morning-watch, Moses seized the other bank of Arabia side; and Pharaoh (as the dawn of the day began to enlighten the obscure air) finding a beginning of the Sea's return, halted himself towards his own Coast: But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea, moved by the power of God, ran back towards the Land with irresistible fury and swiftness, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For, it is written, that God took off their Chariot wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the lands, the Egyptians being stricken with fear of death, ran one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrews, their wheels stuck fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawn out: the Sea coming against them with supernatural violence.

Lyranus, upon Exod. 14. and others, following the Opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearful to enter it, Aminadab, Prince, or Leader of the Tribe of Judab, first made the adventure; and that therefore was that Tribe, ever after, honoured above the rest, according to the Prophecy of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers Sons shall bow down unto thee. But Hierome, upon Hos. 11. condemns this Opinion, And though it be true, that Judab had the first place in all their miracles in the Desert, and, as we now call it, led the Van-guard (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet, that Moses himself was the Conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, it is written in the 77. Psalm; Thou didst lead thy people, like Sheep, by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrews have also another fancy, that the Red Sea was divided into twelve parts, and that every Tribe past over in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalm, according to the vulgar: Divisti Mare Rubrum in divisiones; He divided the Red Sea in divisions. Also that the bottom of the Sea became a green Field, or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelve Pillars, nor twelve Armies of the Egyptians. It is written, Psal. 77. v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy ways: and in the last Book of Wisdom, ver. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now, this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chemres, perished, in the 16. year of his reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in natural colour from other Waters. But, as Philophrastus in his third Book noteth, and ourselves know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entrench at a narrow strait, between Arabia the Happy, and Æthiopia, or the Land of the Abyss: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolemy calleth Possidium, to the other Land of Æthiopia, hath not above six leagues in breadth, and the same also filled every where with Islands, but afterwards it extendeth it self 58. leagues from coast to coast, and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petrea on one side, and Æthiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the uttermost end and indraught of that Sea; where the Turk now keeps his Fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulf; but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses past, is called Heropolites, of the City Hero, sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Pliny calls it Cambijæ, by which name it was known, saith he, before it was called Hero, many years. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North, Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Æleniticum; King Juba, Leniticum; others more properly, Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana, which the Septuagint call Elath; Ptolemy, Elana; Pliny, Lena; Josephus, Ilana; and Marius Niger, Asla: there is also Ilalab in Affrica, to which Salmanasser carried the Israelites captive, 2 King 8. 11. which Ilalab in Affrica, the Septuagint call Elae; and in the first of Chro. 5. Ala. But, as for the Red Sea, on the parts thereof, thus diversly named, the Moors, and Arabians (Vassals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulf of Mecca, after the name of Mahomet's Town Mecca. The Greeks write it the Sea Erythraeum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythraeus; and because Erythros in the Greek signifieth Red; hence it is, that being denominated of this Erythraeus, the Son of Persicus and Andromeda, it took the name of the Red Sea, as Quintus Curtius conjectureth; which Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it seems to me, by the view of a Discovery of that Sea in the year 1544. performed by Stephen Gama, Viceroy of the East-India for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of a redness, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many Islands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For, I find by the report of Castro, a principal Commander under Gama (which Discourse I gave Mr. Richard Hachin to publish) that there is an Island called Dalagua, sometime Leques, containing in length, 25. leagues, and 12. in breadth; the earth, sands, and cliffs, of which Island, being of a reddish colour, serve for a soil to the waters about it, to make it seem altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrional latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. miles, lying, as it doth, Northerly & Southerly) all the cliffs, and banks are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beams, give a kind of reddish lustre to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea, towards the shore, great abundance of red iron-ores, which the greatest shore of Corral grows, which is carried into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Islands of this Sea, many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those, growing under water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of redness by the shadow of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first took the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such; which Johannes Barros in his second Decade, eighth Book, and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea, from Elana, or Faion-Gaber adjoining, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers, Sinus Elaniticus, which walbeth the banks of Madian, or Aidian, is for 16. or 17. leagues together, along Northward toward Sues, some 3. leagues, or 9. English miles over, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea, it is in length about 28. leagues, of which the first 26. have 9. miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward, the Lands, both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and strengthen it so fast, as for 6. miles together, it is not above 2. miles over; from thence, upward the Land on Egypt side, falleth away, and makes a kind of Bay, or Cove, for some 10. miles together, after which, the Land grows upon the Sea again, and so binds it into the very end thereof, at 4. miles breadth, or there about, in which Tract it was that Moses past it over, though others would have it to be over against Elana, or Toro, but without judgment; for from Ramefes to Pihacheroth, and Raalzephon, there is not above 30. miles interjaunt, or 35. miles at most, which Moses past over in three days; and between the Land of Egypt, opposite to Elana, or Toro, the distance is above 80. miles. For Ramefes, to which City Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharaoh at Zaan, and took his last leave, standeth in 30. degrees 5. minutes of Septentrional latitude; and Atgedol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountain Climax, or Raalzephon, in nine and twenty and a half, which make a difference of five and thirty English miles, the way lying, in effect, North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not a low ebb.

The Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who, in hatred of the Hebrews, have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebb, upon a great Spring-tide, and that Pharaoh, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was overtaken by the flood, and therein perished; did not well consider the nature of this place, with other circumstances. For, not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plain, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly Wind, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that believe not therein, periwadeth nothing) I say, that by the same natural reason upon which they fastened themselves, it is made manifest, that had there bin no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himself to Moses and the children of Israel, than ordinary and casual, then could not Pharaoh and all his Army have perished in that pursuit.

For wheresoever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the waters fall away from the Land, and run downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land, as far as the Sea can ebb, or fall off, to the dry land. Now, Moses entering the Sea at Atgedol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tide) must have left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand, dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water 10. or 12. miles farther into the Sea than Sues, and between it and where Moses past, who entered the same so far below it, and towards the body of the same Sea; it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve, or Strait, had been by the ebb of a Spring-tide discovered, when Pharaoh found the flood increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might have gone on in his return before the tide, on his right hand; and so taken ground again at the end of the Sea, at Sues it self, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures do truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on between two Seas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwise, Pharaoh, by any return of waters, could not have perished, as he did; and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, prove the cause to have bin a power above nature, and the miraculous work of God himself. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to return back by a strong East-wind, do rather prove the miracle, than that there-

by was caused an ebb more than ordinary; for that Sea did not lie East and West, but in effect, North and South. And it must have been a West and North west wind, that must have driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East-wind blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell back towards the South and main body thereof, the other part remained toward Suez, and the North. Which being unknown to Pharaoh; while he was checkt by that Sea, which used in times before to ebb away, the flood prest him, and over-whelm'd him. Thirdly, seeing Moses avoweth, that Moses was not only of excellent judgment, generally, but also, so great a Captain, as he over-threw the *Ethiopian*s in battels, being employed by Pharaoh, and wan divers Cities, seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grossness, and distrust: that rather then he would have endured the hardness of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded to take that way, and fore-told him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed, as when it ebb'd, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaoh's approach, cried out against Moses, and despair'd altogether of their safety; and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God; *Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward, and lift thee up thy Rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at that time of Pharaoh's approach any ebb at all, but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-wind, whereby the sands discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Suez, from whence the Waters moved not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the Waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the Waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path, not that the Waters stood upright as walls do, as some of the Schole-men have fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soon have quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Further-* more, there is no man of judgment, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his own Country, on his own coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens; and wherein his people having had so many hundreds of years experience of the tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any fore-known or natural accident, but by God's powerfull hand only; which then falleth most heavily on all men, when, looking through no other spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least fear it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary return of the flood, before they could recover their own coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the flood, which runneth up to Suez, and to the end of that Sea, and not have been cast a-shore on the coast of Arabia, where Moses landed, to wit, upon the Sea-bank over against Baalzephon, on Arabia side; where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies, and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would have carried them; Which flood doth not any where cross the Channel, and run athwart it, as it must have done from Egypt side to Arabia, to have cast the bodies there; but it keeps the natural course towards the end of that Sea; and to which their carcases should have been carried, if the work had not been supernatural and miraculous. Apollonius, in the lives of the Fathers, affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which stayed in the country, did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honor those beasts, birds, plants or other creatures, about which they were busied at the time of Pharaoh's destruction; as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a god of that Plant or Root about which he was occupied, and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given else-where. Orosius, in his first Book and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tell us, that in his time, who lived some 400. years after Christ, the prints of Pharaoh's Chariot wheels were to be seen at a low water, on the Egyptian sands; and though they were sometime defaced by wind and weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But here-of I leave every man to his own belief.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them; with a discourse of Laws.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie; with a continuation of the Story, untill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BUt to go on with the Story of Israel, in this fort I collect the times. Moses was born in the year of the World, 2424. Saphra then governing Affria; Orthopolis, Sycania, or Teloponnefus; Crisius, the Argives; Orus, Egypt; and Donacon, Thebais. He died into Midian, when he had lived forty years, in the year of the World, 2474. and two years after was Caleb born. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zaan, in the year, 2514. the last Moneth of the year. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew Moneth Abib, or the 15. of that Moneth, beginning the day (as they) at Sun-setting, in the year of the World, 2514, was the celebration of the Pasover; & in the dead of the night of the same day, were all the first born slain through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrews inhabited not. The 15. day of the first Month of the Hebrews, called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the World, 2514. Moses, with the children of Israel removed from the general Assembly at Rameses, and marched to Succoth. And departing thence, they made their first station at Etham; and journeying from Etham, they encamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, under the Mountain Baalzephon; and in the same night, after midnight, they pass the Red Sea; Pharaoh and his Army perishing in their return, about the first dawn of the day. Moses having recovered the banks of Arabia, gave thanks unto God for the delivery of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entered the Desarts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur. But finding no water in that passage, he encamped at Marah, in the Desert of Etham, which in Exod. 15. 22. is called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea; where the children of Israel, prest with extreme thirst, murmured against Moses the second time: first, at Pharaoh's approach at Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a Tree, growing near a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same thereinto, made the same sweet: a plain type and figure of our Saviour; who, upon the Tree of the Cross, changed the bitterness of everlasting death, into the sweetness of eternal life. Pliny remembers these bitter Fountains in his sixth Book, 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Sesivris first, Darius after him, and lastly, Ptolemy the second, began to cut an artificial River, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to Trade and Navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelve Fountains of sweet water, and threecore and ten Palmtrees, he rested divers days.

Whether this Elim were the name of a Town or City in Moses time, I cannot affirm. And yet the scarcity of waters in that Region was such, as Elim, which had twelve Fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his History of the Holy War, found at Elim, the ruins of a great and ancient City. And at such time as Baldwine the first pass that way into Egypt. Ingressus (saith he) Helim Civitatem antiquissimam, populo Israelitico aliquando famularem; ad quem cum pervenisset, loci illius incolae, Regis adventum praecognito, naviculam ingredientibus, in Mare vicinum se contulerunt; Entring Helim, a very antient City, well known sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the Inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, took Boat, and stifted themselves into the Sea lying near them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and sat down by the banks of the Red Sea; the seventh Mansion. For it seemeth, that he had knowledge of Amalech, who repaired to resist his passage through part of Arabia. And Moses, who had not as yet trained the Hebrews, appointed to bear Arms; nor assured the minds of the rest, who encountering with the the least misery, were more apt to return to their quiet slavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every way accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to undertake or sustain so dangerous an enemy: he therefore made stay at this Mansion, until the fifteenth of this second Month, called Zim, or Jiar; and made the eighth Mansion in the Desert of Zim: where the children of Israel mutinied against Moses the third time, having want of food. In the 16. Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of every several encamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set down.

Here it pleased God to lend to many flights of Quails, as the Country about their encamping was covered with them. The morning following, it also rained Manna, being the 16. of their Month, which served them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattel and Sheep among them, yet it seemeth, that they durst not feed themselves with many of those; but reserved them, both for the Milk to relieve the Children withall, and for Breed to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim, they made two removes of 20. miles; the one to Daphca, the other to Ahus, distant from Raphidim six miles. Here, being again prest with want of Water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of Beasts, than to suffer a casual, and sometime necessary want, and to undergo the hazards and travels which every many mind feels after, for the love of God, and their own freedoms. But Moses, with the same Rod which he divided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rock, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battle with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming; who, being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

And while Moses encamped in this place, the Amalekites, who had knowledge of his approach, and guessed that he meant to lead the children of Israel through their Country (which being barren of it self, would be utterly waited by to great multitude of People and Cattel) thought it most for their advantage to sit upon them at Raphidim, where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man, enfeebled them. On the other side, Moses perceiving their resolutions, gave charge to Jahus, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrews, to encounter Amalech. Between whom and Israel the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day; the Hebrews and the Amalekites contending with equal hopes and repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses Prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent than all resistance & attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are unacquainted with scarcity of food, and those minds whom a servile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despairing in their first attempts, will hardly, or never, be brought again to hazard themselves.

After this Victory, Jethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his Wife, and his two Sons, which either Jethro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalech the better assured himself of that part of Arabia. For it is written in Exod. 18. 1. When Jethro, the Priest of Adian, Moses Father-in-law, heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech, gave Jethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his Son-in-law, Moses, at Sinai; where, among other things, he advised Moses to appoint Judges, and other Officers over Israel, being himself unable to give order in all causes and controversies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and private controversy.

This Jethro, although he dwelt amongst the Madianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges, Verf. 11. 17. it is manifest: where it is written, Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the Son of Jethro, the Father-in-law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tent in the Plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise, in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountains of Sin Kadesh; and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plains, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites: Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the rock. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giveth giveth for cause, that they shewed mercy to all the children of Israel, when they came up from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the tribes of Adian, one of the six Sons which Abraham begat on Kethura; and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the mother, who (as it seemeth) kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their Parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Adian, and married the Daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) have made Jethro's Daughter the mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seed of Abraham should root out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himself: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chur. For, in the fifteenth of Genesis, vers. 19. these Kenites, or Chusites, are listed with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether Idolatrous. For, as it is before remembered, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites; that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other Sons were born; which he did (referring my self to better judgment) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Adian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites, near the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his Wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seem likewise not to have been corrupted. For these Madianites, with the Kenites, assisted Israel, and guided them in the Deserts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petra, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoining to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Adian, of whom Jethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000. Israelites, as far back as the Red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Adian, where his Wives kindred inhabited; seeing himself coming with 60000. able men, was encountered by Amalech in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Deserts, wherein himself and Israel had wandered forty years.

That Jethro, or Jothor, Raguel, or Revel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar, and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English, Revel, Exod. 2. 18. calls him Jethro, or Jothor. Exod. 3. 1. and 4. 18. & 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10. 12. & in Numbers 10. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

The rest of the Months of this year 2515. were spent in the Desert of Sinai, near the mountain of Sinai, or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai and Horeb were distinct Mountains: Hierom, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For, in Exod. 3. 1. it is called Horeb; and in Exodus 24. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalm, vers. 19. Horeb: in Exodus 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. vers. 24. And again, Deut. 4. 10. and 15. and Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chronicles 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus, 48. 7. they are named as one. Which beareth (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgment of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disjoined at the top, by the report of Peter Belonius; who, in the year 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Funet of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very fair Spring of Water into the Valley adjoining: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Maronites, containing some hundred Religious persons of divers Nations, who had pleasant Gardens, delicate Fruits, and excellent Wine. These (saith the same Author) give entertainment to all strangers, which pass that way.

Now,

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water near Sinai, in Moses' time, it is very probable: First, because he encamped there about almost a year, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: Secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calf to powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drink thereof.

On this mountain, the Law by the Angel of God was given to Moses, where he stayed a whole year, wanting some ten or twelve days: for he removed not till the twentieth day of the second Month of the second year; and he arrived about the five and fourtieth day after the egression; the Law being given the fiftieth day.

At this Manion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that Book; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no Story nor other Passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speak somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and use thereof: whereby, if the Reader find the Story any way disjointed, he may turn over a few leaves, and, omitting this, find the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, level, and square of Laws: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfullest man (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For, as the North Starr is the most fixed Director of the Sea-man to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the Guide and Conductor of all in general to the haven of eternal life: the Law of Nature, from God his eternal Law deduced, the rule of all his creatures; the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and virtuous Men; yea, the very spirit, and the very sinews of every Estate in the World, by which they live and move: the Law, to wit, a just Law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Mind without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth to every man what he ought to have. This benefit the Antient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Laws were honoured as gods; or, as the Sons of gods: and the rest, that made either additions, or corrections, were commended to all Posterity for men of no less virtue, and no less liberally beneficial to their Countreys, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerors that ever governed them. The Israelites, the Lacedæmonians, and the Athenians, received their Laws from one; as the Israelites, from Moses; the Lacedæmonians, from Lycurgus; the Athenians, from Solon; the Romans, sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senators, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: other from the Prince, Nobility, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law and Right.

The word Lex, or Law, is not always taken alike, but is diversly, and in an indifferent sense used. For, if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And so the Rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Laws. Or, it is taken for any private Ordinance of Superiours or Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their Decrees do also usurp that Title, according to the general acceptance of the word Law: of which Ezay, We unto them that decree riched Decrees, and write grievous things. Likewise, the word is used for the tumultuary resolutions of the People. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Laws, though evil and insufficient: Adula lex est, quæ tumultuaria posita est: It is an evil Law, that is made tumultuously. So as all Ordinances, either good or evil, are called by the name of Laws.

The word Law is also taken for the moral habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it self, as to their pattern and plat-form. And thus the Law of the flesh, which the Divines call legem sensus, is to be understood. For every law is a kind of pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which sense, as elsewhere, this moral habit or disposition of the heart, is called the frame, or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law: But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my mind, and leading me captive unto the law of sin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures, are sometime called (a) laws, so far as they agree with the reason of the Law eternal; as the law of a Lion, to be fierce or valiant.

Also private contracts among Merchants, and other Trade-men, do often put on the name of laws. But law, commonly and properly, is taken for a right rule, prescribing a necessary mean, for the good of a Commonwealth, or Civil Community. The rest, to wit, the commandments of Tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentie magis quam leges; rather compulsions than laws: And whatsoever is not just, S. Augustine doth not allow for laws, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec jura dicenda, nec pœnanda sunt; The unjust constitutions of men, which are neither to be learned nor thought laws. For, saith Aristotle, Legalia jura sunt, factura, & conservatio salutatis, just laws are the workers and preservers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlasting; according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, saith Plato, is God, and his worship: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the Law, is so called by the Latines, à legendo, or, à ligando, of reading, or binding: Leges quia lègè & ad populum lègè, saith Varro; For, after Laws were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, ligando, is no less agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a

to the Romans it is called a Law: But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my mind, and leading me captive unto the law of sin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures, are sometime called (a) laws, so far as they agree with the reason of the Law eternal; as the law of a Lion, to be fierce or valiant.

Also private contracts among Merchants, and other Trade-men, do often put on the name of laws. But law, commonly and properly, is taken for a right rule, prescribing a necessary mean, for the good of a Commonwealth, or Civil Community. The rest, to wit, the commandments of Tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentie magis quam leges; rather compulsions than laws: And whatsoever is not just, S. Augustine doth not allow for laws, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec jura dicenda, nec pœnanda sunt; The unjust constitutions of men, which are neither to be learned nor thought laws. For, saith Aristotle, Legalia jura sunt, factura, & conservatio salutatis, just laws are the workers and preservers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlasting; according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, saith Plato, is God, and his worship: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the Law, is so called by the Latines, à legendo, or, à ligando, of reading, or binding: Leges quia lègè & ad populum lègè, saith Varro; For, after Laws were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, ligando, is no less agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a

§. V.

Of the definition of Laws, and of the Law eternal.

But, because Laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to divide and distinguish them. I mean, those sorts of Laws from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of humane laws to their infinite and horrible confusion.

Laws are of 3. kinds: { Eternal, or uncreated. Natural, National, or Internal.

Laws imposed, or of addition, commonly called positive.

1 Divine, which hath two parts.

{ Written.

{ The writ- { The Law of Moses. ten is al- { So double. { The Gospel.

{ Unwritten.

{ As the Doctrine and Religion of the Patriarchs before the written Law of Moses, which some call Calala.

{ Written.

{ Which Cicero in his second Book of Invention calleth Jus Legitimum, divided into the Ecclesiastical, Secular, { Unwritten.

{ As the Laws of Custom and Use.

2 Humane, which is also twofold.

The Law Eternal is thus defined by Thomas. Lex eterna est eternus divine sapientie conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso preconitarum. The eternal Law is the eternal conceit of God's Wisdom, as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himself. Or, Lex eterna est summa actus eterna ratio divine sapientie: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigunt, ut illis iuxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is high and eternal reason of divine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kind of necessity, according to their several natures, or conditions. Now, the difference lies in this: That as the same divine understanding directs all these to their proper ends; so it is called Providence: but, as it imposeth a necessity, according to the nature of all things which it directeth, so it is called a Law.

Of this eternal Law, Cicero took knowledge, when in his Book of Laws, he wrote in this manner: Errat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & a dilecto avocans: que non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est, sed tum orta est. Orta autem sumit cum mente divina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad vetandum, ratio est recta summi Jovis; That perfect reason and nature of things, incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling us back from evil, did not (saith he) then begin to be a law when it was written, but when it had begun. Being and beginning it had together with divine understanding, and therefore a true Law, and a fit Princeps to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternal Law (if we consider it in God, or as God) is always one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to divers objects, so the reason of man finds it divers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the heavens, stability of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternal Law, all things are directed, as by the counsel and providence of God: from this Law, all laws are derived, as from the rule universal, and thero referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternal, and the divine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternal directing more largely: as well every creature, to their proper and natural ends, as it doth Man to his supernatural: but the divine Law to a supernatural end only: the natural law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternal: as it were a stream from the fountain.

The Law humane or temporal is also thence drawn: in that it hath the form of right reason; from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition; and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternal Law all things are subjected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, natural or moral, and humane. For the Law eternal runneth through all the universal, and therefore it is the Law also of things which are simple, natural and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Director: as Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sun and Moon, all bright Stars: Heavens of heavens, for he hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not pass: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Deepes; fire and hail, snow and vapours, stormy winds which execute his word: mountains and hills, fruitfull trees, and all Cedars; Beasts and all Cattel, &c. Now, as the reasonable creatures are by this eternal Law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other natural things and creatures have in themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formal to it, without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For Beasts are led by sense, and natural instinct: thinks without life by their created form, or formal appetites, as that which is heave to fall downward; things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoever is applied. This kind of working, the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature; others to fate; a difference used in terms only; it being no other than God's general providence: for, as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appear in themselves thence derived, thence under subjected, thence from by his eternal Law and providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heaven and in earth.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these laws: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal Law. But, as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thence from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetitions, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the Law, the whole creature. For, according to S. Augustine, Lex eterna est, quia iustum est, ut omnia sint ordinatissima; The Law eternal is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternal Law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in his first Book of Free-will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses, which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last until the time of the Paedagogie of God's people, or Introduction to Christ, should be expired; which time of expiration, some think our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Cross he said, Consummatus est. But I rather think these words of our Saviour to have no other signification, than that now the Prophecie of their giving him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For so S. John expounds it, when he saith, v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremonial, and of so much of the judicial, as appertained peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the Law of the New Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable Law of God, though preferring things mutable, is not therefore changed in it self; but the things prescribed change according to this eternal ordinance, of which the Wisdom of Solomon, and being one, she can do all things, and remaining in her self, reneweth all.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

OF the Law of Nature, as it is taken in general, I find no definition among the School-men; only as it is considered in Man, it is called The impression of divine Light, and a participation of the eternal Law in the reasonable creature. Lex Naturalis est impressio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio Legis eterne in rationali creatura. Ulpian defines the natural Law to be the same which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Jus naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Jus inquit non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium que terra marique nascuntur, avium quoque commune est; The Law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all living creatures, as well Birds, as to those the Land and Sea produce. But this definition is not general, but of the natural Law in things of life.

The Law of Nature in general, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formal quality, which God in his eternal Providence hath given and imprinted in the nature of every creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in men, enlightning our formal reason; so it is more than sense in Beasts; and more than vegetation in Plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them, at first sight, and without experience

perience or instruction, to flee from the enemies of their lives: seeing that Bulls and Horses appear unto the sense more fearful and terrible, than the least kind of Doggs; and yet the Hare and Deer feedeth by the one, and fleeth from the other: yea, though by them never seen before, and that as soon as they fall from their Dams. Neither is it sense, which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their Nests high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India, to make their Nests on the smallest twigs which hang over Rivers, and not on any other part of the Tree, or elsewhere, to save their Eggs and young ones from the Monkeys and other Beasts, whose weight such a twig will not bear, and which would fear to fall into the Water. The instances in this kind are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of Plants, that some Trees, as the female of Palmito, will not bear any fruit, except the male grow in sight. But this they do by that Law, which the infinite and unsearchable Wisdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In Man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt: corrupt, where the reason of Man hath made its self subject, and a Vassal to Passions, and Affection: Brutal: and incorrupt, where time and custom hath bred in Men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kind of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which S. Augustine calleth the Law of Reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrain'd to become Idolaters; that by the Laws of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to use one another's Wife, and to the women, to choose them others besides their Husband, to beget their child: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Scythians, and the People of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloved Wives: as also they have many other customs remembered by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Laws some men avow to be natural: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guilt with guilt: to become faithless among the faithless: to provide for our selves by another man's destruction: that Injury is not done to him that is willing; to destroy those whom we fear, and the like. For taking the definition of natural laws, either out of S. Augustine, or

Aquinas (the one calling it the impression of divine light; the other, the dilate, or sentence of prædique reason) the same can teach us, or incline us to no other thing than to the exercise of Justice and uprightness: and not to offer or perform any thing toward others, save that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selves. For, such is the Law of Nature to the Mind, as the Eye is to the Body; and that which, according to David, sheweth us good, that is, the observation of those things which lead us thereby to our last end; which is eternal life; though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of God's divine light in men, and a participation of the law increased and eternal. For without any law written, the right reason and understanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our selves, sufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evil, which by our gratitude to God and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selves. For when the Gentiles (saith S. Paul) which have not the law, do by nature those things which are contained in the law: they having not the law, are a law unto themselves. Now, to love God, by whom we are, and to do the same right unto all men, which we desire should be done unto us, is an effect of the purest reason; in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of Conscience hath made her residing place and habitation: In arce altissimæ rationis quies habitat. Therefore the Gentiles (saith S. Paul) which show the effects of the law written in their hearts, have their consciences for a witness of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himself (while he hopeth to abuse the World by the advantage of hypocrisy) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his own Soul, by crafty unrighteousness, purchasing eternal perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the World's eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the World, Sed florile dum loquimur, arefcit: Those flowers wither, while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selves, and become fearful Witnesses of our secret evils, did that reverend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden Precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque neque tecum: maxime omnium verere teipsum. Commit nothing foul or dishonest, faith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own heart: but above all men, reverence thine own Conscience. And this may be a Precept of Nature and right Reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their own form; as Fire to give heat. Now, as the reasonable mind is the form of Man, so is he aptly moved to those things which his proper form presenteth unto him: to wit, that which right Reason offereth: and the Acts of right Reason, are the acts of Virtue; and in the breach of the rules of this Reason, is a man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the Herb, which feedeth feed, &c. and the Beast, which liveth thereon. He gave a law to the Seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds; which they obey. He made a decree for the Rain, and a way for the Lightning of the Thunders. He caused the Sun to move, and to give light, and to serve for signs, and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as Man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once break the Law of their natures and forms; the whole World would then perish, and all return to their first Chaos, darkness, and confusion.

By this natural Law, or law of humane Reason, did Cain perceive his own wickedness and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not only feared the displeasure of God, but the revenge of men; it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgment of well and evil doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternal Law, before the Law written, Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou do well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou do not well, sin lieth at thy door.

The school-men are large also in this Question of the natural Law; the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this Subject.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth An act of Reason taken properly; and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practick reason; they divide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration

(as that good is to be followed, and evil eschewed) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved out of higher and more universal propositions. Again, as it answereth the natural appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the first, to desire to live, and to satisfy hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew pains, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. For in every man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of natural Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to live, and to preserve our being and life, as also the desire of illue, with care to provide for them: for the Father, after his death, lives in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable Laws of Nature, for the most part. For it needs no proof, that all creatures should desire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their illue, when they cannot in themselves. And as Man is a Being, Ens or Res; so he doth desire good, and shun evil. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their own natures, which is, to desire their own good. And so is good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil upon the 44. Psalm approveth: Rectè quidem bonum definierunt, quod omnia expetunt: Rightly have some men defined good, or goodness, to be that which all things desire.

The second kind of appetite, is of those things which appertain unto us, as we have sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, we desire the delights of every sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut us with satiety, nor hurt us with excess. For, as Sense it self is for the preservation of life and being; so is it meet, even by the law of Nature, that the sensitive appetite should not carry us to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in Beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath given divers laws unto them: In which sense the Civilians define natural Right, or Jus naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Yet the school-men admit not, that the instincts of Beasts can properly be called a law, but only a Jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aim of every law. For so they distinguish it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Jus is not to be taken for a law, but for the matter of the law. And yet where Ulpian also distinguishes the right belonging to living creatures in general, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Jus Naturæ, the other Jus Gentium: the Divines understand the law of Nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine reason, both in Beasts and Men; and refrain the law of Nations to a kind of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertain properly to Man, as he is a living creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selves: and the laws of this appetite are the commandments of our Religion.

Now, although there are many other branches and divisions of this law of Nature answering the division of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth; yet is the law of Nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountain or root in the natural or motive faculty, which is but one, stirring up to good, and declining the contrary: secondly, because all is contained in that general natural precept, That good is to be followed, and ill avoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this law of Nature binds all creatures, it is manifest; and chiefly Man; because he is endued with reason: in whom as reason groweth, so this band of observing the law of Nature increaseth; Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adveniente mandato peccatum revixit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to pass, which was written by S. Paul,

Rom. 1. 18. When the commandment came, sin revived.

Neither is it a small warrant for this law of Nature, when those that break the same, are said by S. Paul, To be delivered over into a reprobat sense (or mind) to do those things which are not convenient: And again, that their consciences bear witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of Nature stretch not to every particular; as to command fasting and the like; yet it commandeth in general all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to right and reason. And therefore said Damasenus; Homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made evil, by declining unto that which is contrary to Nature: And S. Augustine, Omne vitium nature nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est: Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of Nature so streight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For, whereas by this law, all men are born Lords of the Earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit; by taking from the evil, and giving to the good; and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of Justice and Equity.

And though the law of Nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some cases, this her law she suffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the Universal principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who, according to S. Paul, abideth faithful, and cannot deny himself.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

AFTER the Eternal, and Natural, the law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather an explication of the former, hath two kinds; Divine, and Humane. Again, the Divine positive law is double; the Old, and New: The Old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinai, or Horeb, at such time as the World had stood 2513. whole years: and in the 67. day of this year, when as Astacades, or Asiades governed the Affyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argives, Cecrops Attica, and Acheres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. years. And this, it seems, was the first written law which the World received. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after, invented by the Grecians; no, not in Homers time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80. years at least; and Troy it self was cast down 335. years, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This law it pleased God to engrave in Stone, that it might remain a lasting Book of his expressed Will in the Church: and that the Priests and People might have whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous People in Egypt, might be without excuse, the slight delinquencies of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason known to us, why this law was not written before, is, that when the People were few, and their lives long, the Elders of Families might easily, without any written law, instruct their own Children; and yet, as they increased, so doublets they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and evil; nor condemn every sin in particular: nor sufficiently terrify the consciences of offenders; nor so expound divine Worship, as for those afterwards was required, who gave every day less authority than other to the natural law; In these respects it was necessary, that the law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men; which before, they might, but would not read in their own consciences. The School-men, and the Fathers before them, enlarge the causes and necessity, why the law was written; whereof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The law of the Lord is undefiled, converting Souls: The testimonies of the Lord are faithful, giving wisdom to children. For the humane law, saith S. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit; but the divine law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore, by David, it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our minds. For the laws of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no less clean in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words converting our Souls, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum nulle essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur: The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the mind.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversity of Opinion, and difference of peculiar laws among sundry Nations, we cannot be assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without error; and therefore also said David, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithful, giving wisdom to children.

§. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of Time, between the Creation and the written Law, the World and People of God were left altogether to the law of Reason and Nature, it doth not appear. For the Patriarchs of the first Age received many Precepts from God himself, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enoch: from whom it descended to Noah, sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Ye many particular commandments afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by tradition; which kind of teaching the Jews afterward called Cabala, or Receptio: Precepts received from the mouth of their Priests and Elders; to which the Jews after the law written, added the interpretation of secret Mysteries, reserved in the bosoms of their Priests, and unlawful to be uttered to the People. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the divine Law revealed to the Patriarchs, and from them delivered to the Posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all Beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of understanding, they were sufficiently known. For, finding the reason of his own name Adam, or Adami, Earth, or red clay, he gave other names significant, not only to Beasts, but to his Children and Nephews, which afterward his Iliads imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather one given in recompence for Abel that was slain; and Enoch signifieth Man, or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the Ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was Marriage first instituted, all men thereafter being commanded to co-habit with their Wives, rather than with their Father or Mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the Law written, and before the Flood it self, it is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of Mankind by the general Flood. For God said unto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me; for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the Earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that lived: God's Mercy and Justice interposing between the untaught and Revenge. This Commandment God repeated to Noah, after the Waters were dried up from the Earth: Whoso sheddeth Man's blood, by Man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God hath He made Man.

Also the law of honouring and reverence

* The common read is, in semine tuo: but God did not desire that people should live by the labour of the earth, and not this. For, this is the true place where the true hope, which it hath, is to be directed to. Gen. 1. 1. Gen. 2. 4. Gen. 2. 5. Gen. 2. 6. Gen. 2. 7. Gen. 2. 8. Gen. 2. 9. Gen. 2. 10. Gen. 2. 11.

ing our Parents, was observed among the faithful, and the contrary punished by the Father's curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall be unto his brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural sin of the Sodomite was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from Heaven. The sin of Adultery and Ravishment, was before the Law no less detested than the rest, as appeareth by that revenge taken for Dina's forcing: and by the judgment which Juda gave against Tamar, That she should be burnt; and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken; for she is a man's Wife. To these we may add the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of clean and unclean Beasts, of Circumcision, of the brother to raise up seed to his brother that left a Widow childless, and divers other constitutions, partly Moral, and partly Ceremonial, which being delivered before the written Law were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called, The Old Testament, may be said, not only to have been written in the hearts of men, before it was engraven in stone, but also in substance to have been given in Precept to the Patriarchs. For, as S. Paul witnesseth of himself, I knew not sin, but by the Law; so ever the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kind of unwritten Law; the Angels intuitively; Men, by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things Inanimate, by their necessary motions, without sense or perception.

Of the Moral, Judicial, and Ceremonial Law, with a note prefixed how the Scripture speaketh not always in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

Now, as the word (Law) in general, as is aforesaid, hath divers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain; so the Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diversly: as sometime for the Old Testament; as, Now we know, that whatsoever the Law saith, it saith to them which are under the Law.

When it is opposed, or differentiated from the Prophets and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Books of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must be fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by Faith, without the works of the Law.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of God's wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the Law, and summum Jus: as, For ye are not under the law, but under grace.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or Signs are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like; then it signifieth but shadows and figures; as, The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christ's coming, it signifieth the whole policy of the Jews Common-wealth; as, Before Faith came, we were kept under the law, &c. Or the law of the Order and Institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Prophets & the Law, or the Priests, prophesied unto John. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Actonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The law of the Spirit of life, the law of the force of sin and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c.

But the Written Law of Moses, or the law of the Old Testament, of which we now speak, is thus defined. The law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holiness and Justice, promising eternal life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the Law, and threatening Death to those which break the Law in the least. For, according to S. James, Whoever shall keep the whole, and fail in one point, is guilty of all. The definition used by the school-men, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus given: Lex divina est divinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium, ut apte pervenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, que est ultimum humane vite finis: the divine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto men a necessary mean, whereby they may apply attain supernatural beatitude, which is the last end of man's life.

The Law of Moses hath three parts: Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial. The Moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in particular particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of Nature commands it but in general. Again, the Moral law en-treateth of virtue and goodness; the Ceremonial of divine service, and of holiness; (for external worship, and the order of hallowing our selves unto God, is called Ceremony) and the Judicial teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Jews, and prescribeth orders for justice and equity. And therefore was it said of

S. Paul, The Commandment is just, holy, and good: just, or justice being referred to the Judicial: holy, or holiness to the Ceremonial; good, or honest to the Moral. The Judicial part is touching the government of the Common-wealth of the Jews, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremonial is divided into four parts, according to the four kinds of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, holy things, Sacraments, and Observances. To Sacrifices belong Beasts, and the Fruits of the earth; to holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passover, and such like. For Observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certain meats, as not to eat the blood and fat of Beasts; or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifying, anointings, and attire, as not to wear mix'd Garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other unnatural and improper commixtion; as, Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough, an Ox and an Ass, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth to natural compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty, even to Beasts, Birds, and Plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some refer these Precepts, Thou shalt not kill the Bird sitting on her Nest, nor beat down the Buds of the Tree, nor muzzle the labouring Ox, and the like, to the Ceremonial Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respect the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Moral liveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away; saving in the ability of justifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to love and worship God: and to use charity one towards another, which for ever shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done; which power of directing by special Rules and Precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be observed: though principally for fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremonial also lived in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body itself is represented to us. Besides, it still liveth in that it giveth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giveth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient; although in a far fewer number than before Christ's coming, and in a far less degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Judicial liveth in substance, and concerning the end, and the natural and universal equity thereof.

But the Moral faileth in the point of justification, the Ceremonial as touching the use and external observation (because Christ himself is come, of whom the Ceremonies were signs and shadows) and the Judicial is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews Common-wealth and Policy.

A Proposal of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

As for that which remaineth in general consideration of the divine Written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majesty of the Law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the People receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.
7. The end and use of the Law.
8. The fence and understanding of the Law.
9. The duration and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proved by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and just, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial.

2. The Majesty of the Law-giver is approved in all his creatures; who, as he hath given all things their lives and beings, so he only gave the Law, who could only give the end and reward promised, to wit, the salvation of Mankind; but he gave it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of Angels, as it is said: And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: And in the Acts, He gave the Law by the Ordinance of Angels.

3. The Propriety and Peculiarity of the People receiving the Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and distinguished. Thirdly, in that they were the Children of the Promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and severed they were, because of God's choice and election. Children of the Promise they were, for the Promise was made by God unto Abraham and his seed; not unto his seeds, as to Ethan and Jacob, but to his seed, as to Jacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now, to Abraham and his seed was the Promise made; he saith not, to the seeds, as speaking of many, but, to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Augustine; that it was about the middle time, between the Law of Nature and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses; the Law written in the commandments received by Moses in the Worlds year, 2514. continued to the Baptism of John; from which time, began the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or sign of, our Justification; but not by itself sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in moral precepts. For through the Passion of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the World; and therefore S. Paul calleth the Rudiments of the Law, beggarly and weak; beggarly, as containing no Grace, weak, as not able to forgive and justify. The blood of Goats and Bulls, and the Ashes of an Heifer could only cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward Soul. For if the Law could justify, then Christ died in vain.

§. XI.

Of the sixth Point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

The old and new Testament differ in name, and in the mean and way proposed for attaining to salvation; as the old by Works, the new by Graces; but in the thing it self, or object and remote end, they agree; which is, mans happiness and salvation.

The old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesses of Gods Will, was called the old, because it preceded the new Testament; which is an explication of the old: from which the new taketh witness. Yet the new is of more excellency, in that it doth more lively express, and openly and directly delineate, the ways of our redemption. It is also called the old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith, the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the old Law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderful miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable; but the new was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalypsis, a Testament and Gospel for ever during.

The old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chief part is of the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmists are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The new Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chief part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Books, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts, or Story of the Apostles, are plentiful Interpreters thereof: The word Evangelium, signifying a joyful, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the Messenger bringing joyful news. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing success, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tidings in general, as in Ezay 52. v. 7. concerning peace. Secondly, by an excellency it is restrained, to signify that most joyful message of Salvation, as in Luke 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ; and so we understand the four Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the Doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. and 2 Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in Volumes) is by Daneus comprised in these four.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the Effects, that is, in Righteousness and Justification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament ment and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, so was there one Covenant and Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ; the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one and the same end, even the salvation of our Souls; which, according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the law, an earthly kingdom, a land flowing with Milk and Honey, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings; yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spiritual blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers, notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem; according to this place of the Hebrews: All these died in faith, and received not the promises, but saw them afar off, and believed them; confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also S. Augustine, *Omnia pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promissa terrena, eterna promitti; Few (saith he) do understand the old law; not attending that by things earthly, eternal are promised. And S. Hierom: Noluit Deus pascere Judæos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Judæi somniant; God would not feed the Jews as beasts with corporal gifts and riches, as themselves dream. And this may be gathered out of God's own words, Ego sum Deus tuus; & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gave them this promise, but in respect of the future; to wit, the safety of their Souls. For as God created both Body and Soul, so hath he of his gooddeeds, not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.*

The agreement between the old and new Testament in substance, infers also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law laid by the Apostles and Prophets; in whom all the promises of God in the old and new are assured: the Fathers having eaten the same spiritual food, which we eat in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects, is, in that the knowledge of our sin and misery, which is taught us by the law, maketh way, and, as it were, serveth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and salvation; to which the law serving as an inroduction (for to those which acknowledging their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and salvation) may be said to agree with the Gospel in the effect. For otherwise, if we sever the law from subordination to the Gospel, the effects are very different; the one sheweth the way of righteousness by works, the other by faith; the law woundeth, the Gospel healeth; the Law terrifieth, the Gospel allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth; Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The old restrained the hand, the new, the mind. Data est lex quæ non sanaret (saith S. Augustine) sed quæ agrotantes probaret; The law was given, not to help, but to discover sickness; and S. Chrysostom: Data est lex, ut se homo inveniret; non ut morbus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quæreretur; The law was given, that man might find and know his own imperfection; not that his disease was thereby holpen, but that he might then seek out the Physician. For Christ came to save the World, which the Law had condemned. And as Moses was but a Servant, and Christ a Son; so the greatest benefit was referred to be brought, as by the worthy person, saith Cyril; for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

§. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

The seventh Consideration is of the end, and use of the Law; which is, to bring us to Christ; for finding no righteousness in our own works, we must seek it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and utmost end; the next and proper end of the Law, is to prescribe righteousness, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he that continueth not in all the things of this Law.

The second end of the Law, is, to render us inexcusable before God; who knowing so perfect a Law, do not keep it; the Law requiring a perfect and entire, not a broken or half obedience; but both inward and outward righteousness, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chief end of the law, is, as hath been said, to send us to Christ, and his Grace, being in our selves condemned and lost. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearful tempest, threatening eternal death.

The fourth end of the law was to design, and preserve, the place of the Church and true People of God; and to hold men in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ;

Christ's, after whom the Church was to be dispersed over the whole World.

These be the ends of the Moral Law. The end and use of the Ceremonial law, is to confirm the truth of Christ's, and the new Testament. The use of the judicial, to teach us natural equity and right, whereto we must conform our selves.

The fence and understanding of the law is double, literal, and spiritual; by the literal, we are taught the worship and service of God; by the spiritual, the figures and mystical fore-peakings of Christ's.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being until the Passion of Christ's; before which time, and while Christ's taught in the World, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered upon the Altar of the Crofs, then the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and Figures of Christ's (Christ's being the Body of those shadows) ceased to bind the conscience any longer; the myserie of our Redemption being now by Christ's, and in him, finished. In token whereof the veil of the Temple rent afunder; noting that the ceremonial veils and shadows were now to be removed, not that the moral law of the Commandments was hereby abolished, or weakened at all; otherwise than that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the observing of the law was by Christ's himself severely commanded; our love towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David so much rejoiced, as he preferred the observation of the law before all that the World could yield. *In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And again, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the love of God (saith S. John) that we keep his commandment. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himself in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandment (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it us, and cause us to hear it, that we may do it? Neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the Sea for us, and bring it us? &c. but the word is very near unto thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart for to do it. Eccl. old (saith Moses) I have set before thee this day life and death, good and evil; in that I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his Command-* ments, and his Ordinances, and his Laws, that thou mayst live, &c. Neither is it hid in vain in S. Matthew: Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serva mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments; and in S. John, Scio quia mandatum ejus vita eterna est; I know that his Commandment is life everlasting. And if this be the charity of God, or of Men towards God, as S. John hath taught, to wit, that we keep his Commandments; certainly, he is but a liar, that professeth to love God, and neglecteth to observe the word of his Will, with all his Power. And, though I confess it not in mans ability, without the special grace of God, to fulfil the law (Christ's only a man excepted) yet, if we rightly consider the merciful care which God had of his people in those his Commandments, we shall find in our selves, how we borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chains of obedience, to which the Word of God, and Divine Reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our mind (greedy of liberty) propoeth to it self. For, this is the love of God, that we keep his Commandments, and his Commandments are not grievous, 1 Joh. 5. 12. and if we examine every Precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the balance of our consciences; it is not hard for any man to judge, by what easie persuasions, we steal away from our own power, as unwilling to use it against our pleasing desires.

§. XIII.

Of the several Commandments of the Decalogue; and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our default.

For by the first, we are commanded to acknowledge, serve, and love one God. Now, whereby are we enticed to the breach of this Precept? seeing every reasonable man may conceive and know, that an Infinite power cannot be divided into many infinities; and that it is of necessity, that by this Almighty Unity, all things have been caused, and are continued. And if brute Beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his Providence he hath also provided for every of them, Which growth to Beasts their food, &c. there is no doubt, but they would also serve and love him only.

The second Precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images; the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true; Omnia mala exempla bonis initis oriuntur. All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue; until (saith Lactantius) the Devil crept into them, and (having blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant Souls, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serve himself thereby. For what reasonable man if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blind, deaf, dumb, and dead stocks, more worthless than the most worthless of those, that having life and reason, employ their help, which have neither; yea, of more vile price and baser, than the basest of Beasts, who have sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Widom of Solomon) but call to the weak for help, pray to the dead for life, require aid of him that hath no experience, assistance in our journeys of him that cannot go, and success in our affairs of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the Block to which he prayeth, be more senseless, David maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like unto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

The branch of the third Commandment, is neither persuaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profits; the two greatest incenters of mortal men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdain of God, unless the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an advantage. For, as our corruptest nature gives us nothing towards it, so can it satiate no one appetite, except everlasting sorrow, and Hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custom hath the Devil brought up among men, without all subtilty of argument, or cunning persuasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornful advantage over us. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft gives satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to covetousness; but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreverent abuse of Gods name, as it giveth no help to any of our worldly affections, so the most salvage Nations of the World do not use it.

The fourth Commandment, to keep the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconvenience. For it giveth rest to the labourer, and consolation to their Masters. And, that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law; as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Ox, and thine Ass may rest, and the Son of thy Maid, and the Stranger may be refreshed.

The fifth of the second Table, to honor our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which Nature it self hath taught us towards them, who, after God, gave us life and being, have begotten us, and born us, cherished us in our weak and helpless infancy, and bestowed on us the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporal and Judicial Ordinances, cursing of Parents, or the cursing them violence, was made death.

The next is, That thou shalt not Murder, that is, Thou shalt not do the acts following the affections of hatred. For the Law of God, and after it, our own laws, and in effect, the law of all Nations, have made difference between slaughter casual, and furious. *Affectio inimica (saith Baron) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work, such as it is*. And certainly, whosoever cannot forbear to commit Murder, hath neither the grace of God, nor any use of his own will.

The third of the second Table, commands us from Adultery. Now, if the preservation of Virginity have been possible for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages have mastered their fleshly desires, and have returned chaste to their Grave: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and injury, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing Marriage is permitted by the Laws of God and men, to all that affect it. And there is no man living, whom the desire of beauty and form hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill, did not himself give suck to this Infant, and nourish warmth, till it grow to strong heat, heat till it turn to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second Table, is, That we shall not steal. And, if that kind of violent robbery had been used in Moses time, which many Russians practise now a-days in England, and, to the dishonour of our Nation, more in England, than in any Region of the World among Christians; out of doubt, he would have censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For, I speak not of the poor and miserable Souls, whom hunger and extreme necessity inforceth; but of those detested Thieves, who, to maintain themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and labouring man; or break by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Bravery, Drunkenness and upon Harlots, in one day, what other men have sometime laboured for, all their lives; impoverishing whole Families, and taking the bread and food from the mouths of their children. And that this scripta re-pente temperari, Vir-ginitas Paradisum.

Commandment might easily be observed, it would soon appear, if Princes would relieve, but for a few years, to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and argument of sparing the first offence, that encourageth these Hell-hounds. And if every man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Commonwealth, but these men would in a short time improve it, or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness, from which, if men could not forbear, the security of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially if he were criminal, that the Law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments, forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another man; either the bodies of their wives for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this Precept seemeth the hardest for men to observe; so esteemed by reason of our frail affections; and yet, if we judge hereof rightly, it may be doubted, whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies, and vain thoughts. For, although it be not ealie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restrain and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seek for grace. How the word Coveting, reacheth to all those, it is to be considered. For, Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of having: And, as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any our natural frailty, or unadvised error; But, as I suppose, the word Concupiscentia is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for some urging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the latter sort; which is, Alus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, que est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper Principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seem, that so long as we resist such motions, they harm us not: as they say, quoniam id resistimus, nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus. As long as we give no assent unto them, it is thought by some, that they hurt us not; and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to bear sway. But these men, as it seems, make nothing forbidden in the tenth Precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not onely the outward act, but also the inward assent unto evil, though it break not out into act, is forbidden; therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held; that some are with assent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For, even so the Moral Philosopher can tell us, that the continent man hath evil desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as, on the other side, the Incontinent hath good desires but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The evil desires, when they are accompanied with assent, are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act; and therefore, if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we must needs say, that the evil desires of the continent man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridled his evil desires, be much better than he that yieldeth unto them; yet, such a man according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous man. For Aristotle himself makes continentia, not to be virtue, but only a degree unto it; confessing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his evil affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true Divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the Continent man the having of these evil desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a virtuous man: so we, that the having of them is a sin. Onely in this we excel him here; that we are able out of Divinity, to give the true reason of this doctrine; which is, that every one sinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evil desires of the Continent man; that is, of which he bridlith them, must needs be sin: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make us know, that by our faithful endeavours to keep his Commandments, we witness our love toward himself; we may not safely give liberty to our vanities, by casting back upon God (who is Justice it self) that he hath given us Precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for us to keep. For, as he is accused (saith Saint Hieron) that avows that the Law is in all things possible to be observed: he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcipisse, Accusatus est, quod falsum, quod Deus habet comandatum, quod in se, et non per nostram culpam, impossibile. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the Law; so is our weakness also in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus lately to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, do our faithful endeavours to observe them: which if we do unfeignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man just, David witnesseth: Enter not into judgment with thy servant, for in thy sight, no flesh that liveth shall be justified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not; And again, Who can say, I have made my heart clean? But, seeing there is no sin grievous without deliberation; let every man's conscience judge him, whether he give way willingly, or restrain himself in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King gives to his subject a commandment upon pain of loss of his love, to perform some service: if the subject, neglecting the same, seek to satisfy his sovereign with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himself to be decided therein.

§. XIV.

If there were not any Religion, nor Judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

And if we consider advisedly, and soberly, of the Moral Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gave unto his People, it will appear, that such was his merciful Providence in the choice of them, as, were there neither pain nor profit adjoined to the observing, or not observing of them; were there no divine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet, if we did not for our own sakes strive to observe these Laws, all Society of men, and all endeavours, all happiness and contentment in this life would be taken away, and every State and Commonwealth in the World fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore these Laws were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every man might enjoy the fruits of his own travel, that right might be done to all men, from all men: that by Justice, Order, and Peace, we might live the lives of reasonable men, and not of Beasts; of free-men, and not of slaves; of civil men, and not of Salvages. And hereof making our humane reason onely Judge, let us see the inconveniences in this life, which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Laws.

As first, what would the issue be, if we acknowledged many gods? would not a far greater hatred, war, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of Ceremony, and diversity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, even among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of Gold, Metal, dead Stones, and rotten Wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the loss of time, and an impossibility to receive thencefrom, either help or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whoever taketh the Name of God in vain, shall not at any time benefit himself by calling God to witness for him, when he may justly use his Holy Name.

The observing the Sabbath Holy, giveth rest to Men and Beasts, and Nature herself requirith intermission from labour.

If we despise our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our children, to scorn and neglect us, when our aged years require comfort and help at their hands.

If Murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankind would be extinguished; and whoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himself.

If Adultery were lawful, and permitted, no man could say unto himself; This is my Son: there would be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to Posterity, no endeavour by virtue and undertaking to raise Families; murders and poisonings between Man and Wife would be daily committed; and every man subject to most filthy and unclean Discases.

If Stealth and violent Rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perish, or live as the Salvages, by Roots and Acorns. For no man laboureth but to enjoy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischief of Robbery, as where Mages for lesser crimes, appointed restitution fourfold, policy of State, and necessity, hath made it death.

To permit false Witnesses, is to take all mens lives and estates from them by corruption; the wicked would swear against the virtuous: the waster against the wealthy; the idle Beggar and Loyerer, against the careful and painful Labourer; all trial of right were taken away, and Justice thereby banished out of the World.

The covering of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of mind, with an inward vexation; for while we covet what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitless hopes, so long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the Wives, or goods of our neighbours; we can look for no other, but that our selves shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the general and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in respect of himself, did the most merciful and provident God ordain them; without the observation of which, the virtues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no use. For we should remain but in the state of brute Beasts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

§. X V.

Of humane law, written, and unwritten.

Humane law, of which now it followeth to speak, is first divided into two (viz.) Written, and unwritten. The unwritten consists of usages, approved by time; which Ulpore calls Adores; and he defines Adores to be Consuetudines vetustate probatae; to be customs approved by antiquity, or unwritten laws. Now custom differeth from use, as the cause from the effect; in that custom is by use and continuance established into a law; but yet there, where the law is defective, saith Ulpore.

And of customs there are two general natures, containing innumerable particulars: the first are written customs, received and exercised by Nations, as the customs of Burgundy and Normandy, the ancient general custom of England, and the customs of Castile, and other Provinces.

The second are these petty customs, used in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The general or National customs are some written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty customs are seldom written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitation. The custom of the Dutchie of Cornwall, comprehending also the Stannary of Devon, as touching Tinn, and Tinn causes are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoever, use and time hath made these customs as laws, yet ought every cu-

tom to be rationalis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis, quod de jure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Ulpian) quod ab initio viciosum est, non potest tractu temporis convalescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all laws of custom; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law Divine, and Natural; the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance; it being manifest, that every custom which is against the law, had its beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customs of this nature, were but tolerated for a time, by the law-makers, though they have been since continued; because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moved. For, Non sufficit simplex tolerantia. And it is in this sort over-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius, qui novam legem & novam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custom against law, save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane law, generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doom of practick reason; by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the law a common precept, the advancement of wise men, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Ulpore calls the law, a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for government and common profit; And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit, Alii that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely, it is thus defined. Humane law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the law natural and eternal; made by the rational discourse of those, that exercise publick authority; prescribing necessary observances to the subject. That every law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying, Adhuc lex esse non videtur, quae iusta non fuerit; It seems to be no law at all to me, which is not just; and just it cannot be, except it agree with the law natural and eternal. For there is no law just and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternal. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines derivaerunt.

Secondly, it ought to be confirmed by discourse discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the law natural, to wit, the natural, demonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorized Magistracy, it cannot be doubted, be the government of what kind soever. For it falleth otherwise under the title of those decrees called Voluntas, or iniqua constitutiones; Tolerance, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane law there are four properties, especially answering these four considerations in the former definition. First, as it is drawn out of the law of Nature; so, were particular of the humane law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the natural.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred unto, and doth respect, the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publick authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the law, it prescribeth and directeth all humane actions. And so is the law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fill under it. For, according to Thomas, Alia lex Julia de Adulteriis, Alia Cornelii de Sicariis; The law of Julian against Adultery, is one the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another. Now, the humane law generally taken, is in respect of these considerations, divided into the law of Nations, and the Civil.

The law of Nations is taken less or more properly; less properly for every law which is not of it self, but from other higher principles deduced; and so it seemeth that Ulpian understands it: for he defineth Jus Gentium, or the law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongst men, as Religion, and the Worship of God; which is not in the very nature of this law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other divine Revelations. But the law of Nations properly taken, is that dicta, or sentence, which is drawn from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations do assent unto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted between enemies, &c. which National law, according to divers acceptations, and divers considerations had of the humane law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Natural, sometime of the Humane.

Jus civile, or the civil Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in divers Estates it is also divers and peculiar, and this law is not so immediately derived from the law of Nature, as the law of Nations is: For, it is partly deduced out of such principles, as all Nations do not agree in, or easily assent unto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are divers, and do not fit all Estates. Hercof Ulpian, Jus civile neque in totum a Naturae & Gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei servit: atque cum aliquid addimus, vel detrahimus juri communi, jus proprium, id est, Civile efficitur; The civil Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of Nature and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore, when we add ought to, or take from the law that is common, we make a law proper, that is, the Civil Law.

The law now commonly called the Civil Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decemviri, 303. years after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian and other Grecian laws, as out of the ancient Roman customs and laws Regal. The Regal laws were devised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiae, or Papiriane, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquinius then reigning. For, though to many of the former laws as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished with the name; yet those of Servius Tullius, for commerce and contracts, and all that appertained to Religion and common Utility, were continued, and were a part of the laws of the twelve Tables. To these laws of the twelve Tables, were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senatus, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebei-scita; those of the Lawyers, called Responsa-prudentum; and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrate; which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperor, they were by him confirmed, and made perpetual laws, and the Volume styled, Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like collections of Justinian afterward were.

The difference antiently between Laws and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that laws are the Constitutions made or confirmed by Sovereign Authority (be the sovereignty in the People, in a few, or in one) and are withall general and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Justin Magistratus, unless by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicto tribunt, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most to an Edict, say that it is a law for one year: Though Ulpore doth also expels by the word Constitutiones or Edicts, those Ordinances called Adi of Prerogatives; as, Constitutio, vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordain, or proclaim.

Lastly, the humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiastical, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporal good, to wit, the Peace and tranquillity of the Common-weal; the Ecclesiastical, the spiritual good, and right government of the Ecclesiastical Common-wealth, or Church: Unde nature legem, hoc divini imperii est; ut respiciat ibi the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And so may jus Civile be taken two ways; First, as distinguished from the law of Nations, as in the first division: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diverse from the Ecclesiastical. But this division of the School-men is obscure. For although the Civil be the same with the Secular, as the Civil is a law, yet the Secular is more general, and comprehendeth both the Civil and all other laws not Ecclesiastical. For, of Secular laws in use among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-wealths, there are three kinds; the Civil, which hath every where a voice, and is in all Christian Estates (England excepted) most powerful; the laws of England, called Common, and the laws of custom, or Provincial. In Spain, besides the law Civil, they have the customs of Castile, and other Provinces. In France, besides the Civil, the customs of Burgundy, Blois, Berry, Noirmont, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situez & assis en Lodunois, seront gouvernez selon les costumes dudit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be governed according to the customs of that place. There are also in France the customs of Normandy, and these of two kinds; General, and Local; and all purged and reformed by divers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customs, before and since their reformation have these words: Not autem Regis firmum prædictum, usus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & auctoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register as for said laudable use, and ancient customs, we praise, approve, and by our Kingly Authority confirm. The Common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient customs of the same, and of certain Maxims by those customs of the Realm approved. Upon which customs also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customs of England have been approved by the Kings thereof from Age to Age: as that custom by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custom of England, that the eldest Sons should inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland, it is the custom of all Lands (that have not been resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enjoy the Inheritance during his own life; and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the heir in lineal descent; this is called the custom of Tanistry. For example, if a Lord of Land have four Sons, and the eldest of those four have also a Son, the three brothers of the eldest Son shall, after the death of their brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the grandchild: the custom being grounded upon the reason of necessity. For the first in former times, having always lived in a subdivided civil War, not only the greatest against the greatest, but every Baron and Gentleman one against another, were enforced to leave successors of age and ability, to defend their own Territories. Now, as in Normandy, Enguendy, and other Provinces of France, there are certain peculiar and petty Customs, besides the great and general custom of the Land, so are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greatest bulk of our Laws, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament; Laws propounded and approved by the three Estates of the Realm, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which, all men are therefore bound, because they are Acts of choice, and self-desire. Leges nulla alia causa nos tenent, quam quod iudicio populi recepte sunt; The Laws do therefore bind the Subjects, because they are received by the judgment of the Subject. Nun demum humane leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modo institutæ, sed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane laws have their strength, when they shall not only be desired, but by the approbation of the People confirmed.

Moreover I sheweth these properties to every Christian Law, that the same be honest, that it be possible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the custom of the Country; also for the time and place, convenient, profitable, and manifest; and without respect of private profit, that it be written for the general good. He also gives four effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and infirmation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid vice; the later encourageth with hope, to follow virtue. For, according to Cicero, Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, tritem, commendatricemque virtutum: It behooveth the Law to be a mender of Vices, and a commendator of Vertue. The part obligatory, or binding us to the observation of things commanded, or forbidden, is an effect common to all laws; and it is two-fold: the one constraineth us by fear of our consciences, the other by fear of external punishment. These two effects the Law performeth, by the exercise of these two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is Infirmation, or encouragement to Vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the Law, to make men virtuous. For laws being such as they ought to be, do both by prescribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing; laying before us the good and the evil by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are those into which the law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof; saying, Declina a malo, & fac bonum, Decline from evil, and do good.

§. XVI.

That only the Prince is exempt from humane laws, and in what sort.

NOW, whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that have written of this subject, as well Divines as Lawyers; and namely, whether Sovereign Princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the Law, as aforesaid; the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive, the one ought to be subject, but not to that which constraineth. For, as touching violence, or punishments, no man is bound to give a pre-judgment against himself; and, if equals have not any power over each other, much less have inferiours over their superiours, from whom they receive their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of Laws, simply then is the Prince so much above the laws, as the Soul and Body united, is above a dead and senseless Carcase. For the King is truly called, ius vivum, & lex animata: An animate, and living law. But this is true, that by giving authority to laws, Princes both add greatness to themselves, and conserve it; and therefore was it said of Braddon out of Julianus, Merito debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: nam

lex facit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightly ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the law first attributeth to the King; for it is the law that doth make Kings.

But whereas Braddon ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and laws divine; and by humane laws only, declared to be Kings. As for the places remembered by the Dramas and Ameyers, which infer a kind of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of virtuous Princes, who are to give an account of their actions to God only.

This first power, faith David, against thee only have I sinned; therefore the Prince cannot be said to be subject to the law; Princeps non subijctus legi. For seeing, according to the School-men, the law humane, is but quoddam organum, & instrumentum potestatis gubernative: non videtur posse ejus obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa potestas humane non pertinet; sed usque citius humane non se extendit ad gubernatorem in quo illa residet. Ergo, neque lex constituta per talia potestatem obligare potest ipsam constitutorem. Omnis enim potentia activa, est principum transjunctandi aliud; Seeing humane law (say they) is but a kind of organ, or instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend it self to bind any one whom no humane power can controul, or lay hold of: but the Governour himself, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himself, or by his own power, be controlled. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot bind the Law-maker himself: for every active ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it self resides. And seeing Princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the law; Ergo, etiam potest ipsemet Princeps, sive Legislator sua voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince, or Law-maker, at his own will and pleasure, deliver himself from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate conditionis. Princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communitatis; The subjects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince only by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Now, concerning the politick laws, given by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no civil Institutions of other People should presume, to digress, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question on for such men to decide, whose professions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, That we ought not to seem wiser than God himself, who hath told us, that there are no laws for righteous, as those which it pleased him to give to his Elect People to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their several qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no less than in their peculiar Languages; which disagreeable conditions to govern aptly, one and the same law very hardly were able. The Roman civil laws did indeed contain in order a great part of the then known World, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was received and become familiar; yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much unto the natural customs of the sundry people which it governed. For, whether it be through a long continued persuasion; or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heavens; or, peradventure, some temper of the soil and climate, affording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty make the Sybarites luxurious; want, and opportunity to steal, makes the Arabians to be Thieves) very hard it were to forbid by law, an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from just and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdom of Congo unhappily diverted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after, with great fury rejected, because plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how necessarily, but more conscientiously than seasonably. In such cases, methinks it were not amiss to consider, that the high God himself permitted some thing to the Israelites, rather in regard of their natural disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant unto the ancient Rules of the first perfection. So, where even the general nature of man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjust; there may the law, given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the evil, which forsooth man, as near as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custom hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habit, with so long and so public approbation, that the virtue opposing it would seem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the English fashion of apparel in Turkie; there may be a wife and upright Law-giver, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses law required; even as the good King Hzechiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiastical, and therefore the less capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be merciful unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary; which Prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well observed by Mr. Doctor Wilkes, that the moral Judicials of Moses do partly bind, and partly are let free. They do not hold affirmatively, that we are tied to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adjudged, where sentence of death is given by Moses; Christian Magistrates ruling under Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot add unto it, to make the burthen more heave: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becometh not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath been the subject of many learned discourses, neither will I take upon me, to speak any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controversy among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judicial law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath always been very plausible. And surely, howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a general and only law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, wheron the conscience of a Judge may rest, with equal satisfaction in making interpretation, or giving the sentence upon doubts arising out of any law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judge could have been witness, of whom Fortescue, that notable Bulwark of our laws, doth speak, complaining of a judgment given against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury; who being accused by her own man, without any other proof, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a year after, being convicted for the same offence, confessed that his Mistress was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (though over-late) grievously lamented; but this Judge, faith the same Author, Sapienter ipse mihi falsus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animam ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret; He himself often confessed unto me, that he should never, during his life, be able to clear his his conscience of that fact. Wherefore, that acknowledgment which other Sciences yield unto the Metaphysicks, that from thence are drawn Propositions, able to prove the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other polittick institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more justly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysicks which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Fortescue his Discourse, Nemo potest melius, Being as it is being; is infinitely inferior to the Ens Entium; The Being of beings, the only good, the fountain of Truth, whose fear is the beginning of Wisdom. To which purpose, well faith Saint Augustine, Conditio legum temporalium si vobis bonus est, Sapienter, illam ipsam condidit eternam, de qua nulli animo judicare datum est; The Author of temporal Laws, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternal, to determine of which, there is no power given to any Soul. And as well Prince Edward, in Metaphysicks which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Fortescue his Discourse, Nemo potest melius, Being as it is being; is infinitely inferior to the Ens Entium; The Being of beings, the only good, the fountain of Truth, whose foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law, to the death of Moses.

§. I.

Of the numbering and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness; with a note of the reverence given to the Worship of God, in this ordering of their troups.

When Moses had received the Law from God, and published it among the People, and finished the Tabernacle of the Ark, and Sanctuary; he mustered all the Tribes and Families of Israel; and having seen what number of Men fit to bear Arms, were found in every Tribe, from twenty years of age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the LORD, such Princes and Leaders, as in Worth and Reputation were in every Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the Wars, besides Women and Children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was divided by Moses into four grots and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able Men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their number, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting men, led by Naasson; in Issachar, 54400. led by Nathaniel; in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliah. All these marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vaunt-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general encamping on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures, the host of Reuben, had joynted unto it Simoon and Gad, in number, 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. under Elizur; in Simoon, 59300. under Shelumiel; in Gad, 45650. under Elisaph: These had the second place, and encamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joynted the Regiment of Manasse and Benjamin; who joynted together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, encamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. under Elisama; Manasse 32200. under Ganriel; Benjamin 35400. under Abidam.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the general Army, containing 157600. able men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joynted the two Tribes of Nephthali and Asser. And these had the Rere-ward, and moved last, encamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. under Abiezzer; Asser 41500. under Pagiel; Nephthali 53400. under Abira.

Besides these Princes of the several Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over over Tens; as it may appear by that mutiny and insurrection against Moses; Numb. 16. verse 1. and 2. For there arose up against Moses 250. Captains of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renown; of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal Mutineers, with those 250. Captains that followed them, were not any of the Princes of the Tribes or general Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Numb. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, took place not only in the division of the Land of Promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in fortifying them under their several Standards in the Wilderness it was observed. For Judab had the precedency, and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sons of Leah, Jacob's Wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simcon, who had under-gone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the Son of his Mothers Hand-maid. Joseph, who, in temporal blessings, had the prerogative of the first-born, a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and divided into two Regiments; the younger (according to Jacob's prophecy) taking place before the elder; he was assisted by Benjamin, his best beloved brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacob's Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacob's prophecy. He had with him under his Standard, none of the children of Leah, or Rachel, but only the sons of the Hand-maids.

In the middle of these four Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, surrounded by the Levites. Near unto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these four powerful Armies which guarded the same; so it was death for any of the children of Israel to come near it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the movable Temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the service and attendance thereof: of which, 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their several offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the People observed the former order in their encampings: so did the Levites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on every side of the Tabernacle; so the Gersurites on the West, within the Army, and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Elizaph commanded, in number, 7500. The Family of Colath on the South-side, guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and between him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third Company were of the Family of Aterari over whom Zurriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North-side, within the Army of Dan. On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judab led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of Ceremonies, and of the People; under whom, as the chief of all the other Levitical Families, was Eleazar, the son of Aaron, his successor in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their encamping and marching; the Tabernacle being always set in the middle and center thereof. The reverend care which Moses the Prophet, and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Ark, and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeal born towards God himself. The industry used in the framing thereof, and every, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutiful observance in the laying up, and preserving the holy Vessels; the solemn removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the same, which all Ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Andaptists, Brownists, and other Scitaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accompanied a kind of Popery, and as proceeding from an Idolatrous disposition; inasmuch as time would soon bring to pass (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barns, and from thence again into the Fields, and Mountains, and under the Hedges; and the offices of the Ministry (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as those places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-government, left to newness of Opinion, and mens fancies; yea, and soon after, as many kinds of Religions would spring up, as there are Parish Churches within England; every contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; inasmuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple multitude, no less variable than than contrary to it self, the Faith of men will soon after die away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which diffraction gave a great Prince of Germany cause of this Answer to those that persuaded him to become a Lutheran; Si me alius adjungo, vobis tunc condemnor ac aliis: si me alius adjungo, à vobis condemnor, quid ingram video, sed quid sequar, non habeo: Hic I adjungo myself to you, I am condemned by others: If I join with others, I am condemned by you: what I should avoid I see, but I see not what I should follow.

§. II.

The offerings of the twelve Princes: the Passover of the second year: the departing of Jethro.

NOW, when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the service of God, written the laws, numbered his Army, and divided them into the battels and troops before remembered, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelve Princes or Commanders of the Tribes, brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, six covered Chariots, and twelve Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereto, the Sanctuary excepted, which for reverence was carried upon the shoulders of the Sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots, in which was conveyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that service, namely, to the sons of Gershan and Aterari.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered unto God, and for his service in the Temple, a Charger of fine Silver, weighing 130. shekels; a silver Bowl of 70. shekels, after the shekel of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of Gold, of ten shekels, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated unto God by Aaron; and before they marched from Sinai towards their conquest, besides the Beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the law Ceremonial, the weight of all the twelve silver Chargers, and twelve silver Bowls, amounted unto 2400. shekels of silver; and the weight of gold in the Incense-

Cups, to 120. shekels of gold; which makes of shekels of silver, 12000. every shekel of gold valuing ten of silver, so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, was about four hundred and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest, by the Spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the Passover, which they performed on the fourteenth day of the second Month of the second year; and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloud was lifted up from above the Tabernacle, as a sign of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God: Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Then all the people of Israel removed from their encamping at the foot of the Mountain Sinai, towards Paran, the Army, or great Squadron of Juda, led by Nathalon, taking the Vant-guard, followed by Nathaniel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon; after whom the rest marched, as in the Figure express'd. And because the passage through so many Desarts and Mountains, was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing un-forethought, which might serve for the advancement or his enterprise, he instantly intreated his Father-in-law, whom, in the tenth of Numbers, he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprise, as God should bestow on them; for this man, as he was of great understanding and judgment (as appeared by the counsel he gave to Moses for the appointing of Judges over the People) so was he a perfect guide in all these parts, himself inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian or Midian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great years and experience; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Midian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. years before this request made. And though Moses himself had lived 40. years in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to travel; yet the better to assure his passage, and to great a multitude of souls, which could not be so few as a Million, it was necessary to use many guides, and many conductors. To this request of Moses, it may seem by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Numb. 10. 30. that Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, yielded not; for it is evident, that he went back from Moses into his own Country. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the Posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that this his return to his own Country, was rather

The Hebrews weigh the golden grains: to a shekel of silver is about three half pence sterling the shekel of the Sanctuary as it is explained, Exod. 30. 13; compare the 30. Grains, to a Sanctuary shekel of silver is about 7. Grains, the common shekel is but half as much, to wit, 10. Grains: as it is usually expounded; though Polluxandus labours to prove that the common, and the Sanctuary shekel were all one; Numb. 9. 5. Numb. 10. 11. Exod. ult. 34. Num. 9. 17.

§. III.

The Voyage from Horeb to Kades; the Mutinies by the way; and the cause of their turning back to the Red Sea.

After this dismissal of Hobab, Israel began to march towards the deserts of Paran; and after three days wandering, they fate down at the Sepulchres of lust, afterward called Tabera, or Incerpo; by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutineers and Murmurers, which rose up in this remove, which hapned about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second Moneth of the second year, they rested, and fed themselves with Quails (which it pleased God by a Sea-wind to cast upon them) to the 24. day of the third Moneth; to wit, all the Moneth of Sinan, or June; whereof suffuring there died great numbers; from whence in the following Moneth, called Thannus, answering to our July, they went on to Haze-roth, where Miriam the Sister of Aaron was stricken with the leprosie, which continued upon her seven days, after whose recovery Israel removed toward the border of Idumaea, and encamped at Rithma, near Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to inform themselves of the fertility and strength of the Country; as also to take knowledge of the ways, passages, rivers, fords and Mountains. For Arad, King of the Canaanites, surprized divers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush near those ways, through which the discoverers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the return of the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel's whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliverance from the Egyptian slavery, feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wilderness (for so Moses calleth it) with the Victory which he gave them against the powerful Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on, and preserved them, but to bring them, and their Wives and Children to be slaughtered, and given for a prey and spoile to the Amorites, or Canaanites. For, it was reported unto them by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles, that many of the people were Giant-like (for they confel'd that they saw the Sons of Anac there) who were men of fearful stature, and so far over-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them and to themselves, but as Gralhoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to chooſe them a Captain (or as they call it now aday, an Eleſto) to carry them back again into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished every Soul of the whole multitude (Josua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, persuaded the people to enter Canaan, being then near it; and at the mountain foot of Idumaea, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and assuring them of Victory. But as men whom the passion of fear had bereaved both of reason and common sense, they threatened to stone these encouragers to death; accompanying them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the fear of his bright glory between the unadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency & constancy of his servants, preserved them thereby from their violence; threatening an entire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and merciless Pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God delivered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies; alleging, that this so severe a judgment, how deservedly soever inflicted, would increase the pride of the heathen Nations, and give them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel failing in power to perform his promises, suffering them to perish in these barren and fruitless Deserts. Yet, as God is no less just than merciful, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of man's ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand less heave than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity; so by the measure of his glory (evermore jealous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to pass unpunished; reserving his compassion for the innocent; whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserve, and in them to perform his promises, which have never been frustrate.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of their unwillingness to return; with the punishment thereof; and of divers accidents in the return.

Now, when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the People, and made them know his heavie displeasure towards them, they began to bewail themselves, though over-late; the times of grace and mens repentance, having also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his merciful sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt, and make offer to enter the Land, contrary again to the advice of Moses; who assured them that God was not among them; and that the Ark of his Covenant should not move, but by his direction, who could not err; and that the Enemies sword, which God had hitherto bended, and rebated, was now left no less sharp than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites and Canaanites, no less cruel. But as men from whom God hath with-drawn his Grace, do always follow those counsels which carry them to their own destructions: so the Hebrews, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered: and might then have entred Judea before their Enemies were prepared and joyned; did afterward, contrary to Gods Commandment, undertake the enterprise of themselves, and ran head-long, and without advice, into the Mountains of Idumaea. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned, and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them, and of their numbers laughterd the greatest part: and following their victory and perfute, consumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Hormah: the Amalekites, in revenge of their former loss, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites, to prevent their dilatation and destruction threatened. Of which powerful assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings, joined together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarn Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by those painful passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the Red Sea again; in which retreat, before they came back to pass over

Jordan, there were consumed eight and thirty years; and the whole number of the 600. and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Josua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborn and careless generations were wholly worn out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For, besides the double fault, both of refusing to enter the Land upon the return of their discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heaven. For, although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sun and Moon in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places.

Now, after the broken Companies were returned to the Camp at Cades, Moses, according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shoars of the Red Sea. And so from Cades, or Rithma, he removed to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found, and divided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah he crossed the Valley, and fate down at Reſſa, near the foot of the Mountain. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and encamped at Ceclata; where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses always keeping the Valley, between two great legdes of Mountains (those which bound the Desert of Sin, and those of Pharan) cross'd the same from Ceclata, and marched Eastward to the Mountain of Sapher, or Seber; this making the twentieth Manſion. From thence he passed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thabab, and so to Thara, or Thare; the four and twentieth Manſion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; who for their contempt of God and his Ministers, were some of them swallowed up alive, and by the earth, opening her mouth, devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered Incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvels and judgments of God that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses' his Government, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men, who would have usurped Ecclesiastical authority, were suddenly swallowed up alive into the Earth, with their Families and goods; even while they fought to overthrow the Order, Discipline, and Power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church, and Common-wealth of his People. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleased him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his servant Aaron, by the 12. Rods given by the Heads of the 12. Tribes; of which Moses received one of every Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which, being all withered and dried Wands, and on every Rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written; and Aaron's on that of Levi, it pleased God, that the Rod of Aaron received, by his power, a vegetable spirit, and having lain in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Ark one night, had on it both Buds, Blossoms, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharab, the whole Army removed to Meshra; and thence to Esfongaber, and thence to Moseroth (or Mosirut, after S. Hieron.) and from Moseroth to Benjaccan; and so to Gadgad, which Hieron calleth Gadgada; thence to Jctabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where, from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adricomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, between Adanian, and Esfongaber.

Now, although it be very probable, that at Esfongaber, where Solomon furnished his Fleet for the East-India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the Stony, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the Inhabitants convey water in Pipes of Leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Army of Cambyses; yet is Adricomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Jctabata, being the nine and twentieth, or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Pnon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seventh Verse, is also called Jctabata, or Jotabata, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoining. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea at Esfongaber, or Eloib, I cannot believe, for the way thither is very long. And this I find in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia; which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

From Jctabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and encamped at Helrona, & from thence to Esfongaber; which City in Josephus time, had the name of Bereneia; and in Hieronius, Ejsia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloib on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded; Esfongaber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses travelled in that passage.

It seemeth that Esfongaber, or Esfongaber, Eloib and Adanian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor, near the coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Esfongaber, and the other places near the Red Sea, had at this present been subject unto the Idumeans, Moses would also have demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumeans obtained those places: for it is said; And they arose out of Adian, and came to Paran, and took men with them; which were those Companies that followed young Aduad of Idumaea into Egypt, when he fled from Jobab. Likewise it is said of Solomon, that he made a Navie of Ships in Esfongaber, besides Eloib, in the Land of Edom.

§. V.

Of Moses arrival at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

FROM Esfongaber he turned again towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesb; or in Beroth, of the children of Jacan; where they late down in the first Month of the fourthieth year, after they left Egypt. For, at the next Mansion, Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Month of the fourthieth year; the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Esfongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or near it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulchre was to be seen in S. Hieronius time, as himself avoweth. From hence, ere they departed to the Mountain Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heaven; by being devoured and swallowed up by the Earth; by the sudden Pestilence, which often seized them; nor any any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satiated in every of their appetites; but in stead of seeking for help and relief at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their own fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and they were now entered into the fourthieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in sight of the Land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rock adjoining, with his Rod, and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattle were satiated. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kind of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travels of Aaron at the Mountain Hor, being the next, and the four and thirtieth Station. At which Mountain Hor, Aaron was depouled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his Son, as God hath commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen.

Of this Mountain called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Dent. 10. vers. 6. those Hieronius took name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seven and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera, which they write Moseroth, for difference, which was the four and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places; because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Esfongaber, encamped at Mosera, after he departed from Helmona, and before he came to Benjaccan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he had left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister, died; the first being the seven and twentieth, and the second being the four and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should have been written, Hor juxta Mosera; Hor near Mosera; for it is but one root of a Mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as he past towards the Red-Sea on his left hand; by the East part, as he went back again North-wards towards Mosab, as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceive.

Now, it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumaea, praying him that he might pass with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the nearest way of all other from the City of Kadesb, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise, taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon and Jordan, he might have run into many hazards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about, and the many powerful Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now, the better to persuade the Prince of Idumaea hereunto, Moses remembered him, that he was of the same Race and Family with Israel, calling him by the name of Brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the Sons of one father, to wit, Isaac; inhering thereby, that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to assist the Canaanites; against whom, Esau his Ancestor had made Warr, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient Races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his own name, Edom, or Idumaea. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, & of his purposes, and promises assured Edom, or the King thereof that he would no way offend his people, or waste his Country, but that he would restrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high ways, paying money for whatsoever he used, yea, even for the water, which themselves or their cattle should drink. For Moses was commanded by God, not to provoke the children of Esau, Dent. 2. 4. But the King of Idumaea knowing the strength of his own Country, the same being near Canaan, rampir'd with high and sharp mountains; and withal suspecting, as a natural wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entered his Country, it would rest in their wills to give him law, resolutely refused them passage, and delivered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a denial might satisfy or exasperate, he gathered the strength of his Country together, ther, and shewed himself prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written, Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses understanding, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir, or Idumæa, and that the Land promised, was that of Canaan: like unto himself, who was of natural understanding the greatest of any man, and the skillfullest man of War that the World had, he refused to adventure the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gave but a passage to invade others; and which, by reason of the feat of their mountainous Country, could not but have endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendered them less able, if not altogether powerless, to have conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumæa, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumæa, turned himself towards the East, and marched towards the Desarts of Moab. Which, when Arad the King of the Canaanites understood, and that Moses had blanchèd the way of Idumæa; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather than his enemies in his neighbours Country, than to be found by them in his own; which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Moses been enforced first to have made his way by the Sword through Idumæa, and thereby, though victorious, greatly have lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet, being resolved to make trial, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his own home; leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set upon some part of the Army; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many herds of cattle that they drove with them, could not encamp so near together, but that some quarter or other was evermore subject to surprise. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now, it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessor, which joyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which, without direction from God by Moses, would have entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth, that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy 44. the Amorites are named alone, without the Amalekites, and are said to have beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory over Israel, near Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predecessor that then prevailed; this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to pass Moab, determined, while he was yet in the Desert, to try the quarrel. And whereas it followeth in the third Verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites, and their Cities, they are much mistaken that think, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be understood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Joshua. For, had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the Desarts of Zin and Moab, and have fetch'd a wearisome and needless compass, by the Rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it self, but that his Territory lay without it, and near to the Mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt; which South part of Canaan, was the North part of Edom.

Again, Hor (as far as the Israelites, after their victory, pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Judea. There is also a City of that name in Simon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this Victory, it were enough to prove, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Joshua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For, had the Israelites at this time sack'd the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of Water and Bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also Water and Bread. But it was in the time of Joshua, that the Israelites took their revenge, and after they had pass'd Jordan; Joshua then governing them, who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the

the name of his City so called; and with him the King of Hor; to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he named them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now, after this assault, and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compass Idumæa, and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, began again to rebel against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose Venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace, cured them again by their beholding an artificial Serpent, by his commandment set up.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea and Callosyria, encamped at Zalmone; and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making these journeys by the edge of Idumæa, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principal City of the Edomites. Now, where it is written in Numb. 21. 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant, that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonsecas) per viam que habet a latere mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they cross'd, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Tracennitis, and the Countreys of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Esgabeh, Eloth, and Midian; which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel, to shun the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, cross'd the common way towards the East, and then they turned again towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth, where he entred the Territory of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Suph, a Country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountains so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; from thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the Mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not far from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having pass'd that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblahaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieronymus the Prophet, Chap. 48. vers. 22. calleth the Hous of Diblahaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nebuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River Arnon, and encamped in the Mountains of Abarim; though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Heldmodiblahaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, between them and the Amorites; speaking as he found the state of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not antiently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites, even from the Predecessor of Balaac Peor then reigning. From Diblahaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Country; which, though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a reason to the neighbour Nations of the War he undertook. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, observed the same precept which he left to his Posterity and Successors, for a law of the War; namely, in Deut. 20. 10. in these words; When thou comest nigh unto a City to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace; which if it do accept of, and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and serve thee; but if it refuse, &c. then shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all Commanders of armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.

§. VII.

Of the Book of the battels of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

NOW, concerning the War between Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to refer a great part of this Story to that Book, entitled, Liber bellorum Domini; The book of Gods battels: and therefore passeth over many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words, after the Geneva Translation, are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the book of the battels of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar Copy differeth not in sense from this: But the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the book: The War of the Lord hath been (or inflamed) Zool, and the brooks of Arnon, Jusius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genevian and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of Suph, a Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he conjectured. N. II. 2. The Text, he readeth thus, Adireo dicit lolet in recessu bellorum Jehova, contra Vahcban in Regione Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis. Therefore it is spoken in repeating of the battels of Jehovah, against Valeb in the Country of Suph, and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he understands, that amongst the Wars which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the War of Sehon against Isabab, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country near Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Isabab was the immediate Predecessor of Talac, who lived with Moses; though it be written that this Isabab was the Son of Zippor, and not of Isabab. For, it seems (as it is plain in the Edition of the Edonites) that these Kingdoms were elective, and not successive. And as Jusius in this Translation understandeth no special Book of the battels of the Lord: so others, as Talac in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any special Book be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of Wars in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the book of Judges. Syracides, cap. 46. tells us plainly, that those battels of the Lord were fought by Josua; It was there (saith he) before him like to him & for he fought the battels of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often pass over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other books written of the same matter at large; therefore it seemeth probable, that such a book as this there was, wherein the several victories by Israhel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with divine discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Books of Hieronymus, howsoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddeus, and cited by Origen, anti dogon, and by Tertullian.

That work also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Isabab, Isabab, is no where found. The Books remembered by Josua, Chap. 10. Vers. 13. and in the second of Samuel, Chap. 1. Vers. 18. called the Book of Josher, or Josheron, is also left; wherein the stay of the Sun and Moon in the middle of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israhel had avenged themselves of their enemies; out of which also David took the Precept of teaching the Children of Judah, to exercise their Bows against their Enemies.

Some think this to be the Book of eternal Predestination, in which the just are written, according unto the sixty and ninth Psalm, Vers. 28. where it is said; Let them be put out of the book of Life, neither let them be written with the Righteous. Hierom thinks that David by this Book, understood those of Simeon; Rabbi Solomon, that the Books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Israhel, Jacob, and Moses are written. Others, that it was the Book of Exodus. Others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary upon Josua, by an unknown Author.

The Book of Chozai, concerning Mannas, remembered in the second of Chron, Chap. 33. v. 18. and 19. Of this Book, also lost, Hierom conceives, that the Prophet Esa was the Author.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Solomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israhel from the Son of Solomon: As to the Books of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Jeezo the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron, Chap. 9. 1. Vers. 29. With these have the Books of Shemaiab and of Ido, remembered in the second of Chron, Chap. 12. Vers. 15. perished; and that of Jehush the Son of Hanani, of the acts of Jehoshaphat, cited in the second of Chron, Chap. 26. 1. Vers. 34. Also that Book of Solomon, which the Hebrews write Hagrim, of 5000. Verses, of which, that part called Canticum Canticorum, only remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this, divers others of Solomon's works have perished, as his Book of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembered by Origen, Josiphus, Hierom, Cicero, Ajculanus, Picus, Andranda, and others.

Of these, and other Books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Hierusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

WHEN Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nibo; leaving the City of Midian on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South-side of Arnon, having lost all his ancient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battle, God having given that Land to the children of Lot: the time which was antiently possessed by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anac.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Lamzammims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desert of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time pass those Mountains to the East of Bajan, but left their Country to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: so these Nations, which antiently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it self, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbab, which Arbab in Josua is called the father of the Anakims; There had also been Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chief City was Aroer or Ar, near the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Lamzammims; which were of the famous antient Canaanites: and their chief City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Very robust, horrendous Gigantes; Strong men, and fearful Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or How, in the same Province, and not far to the North of Aroer.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Country, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest upon Isabab the Moabites, which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and usurpers, (themselves being of the sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israhel any entrance that way; and withal, prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses incamped in the Country of his new conquests, to wit, the Plains of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses waited with the multitude of his people and cattle. Towards him therefore hasting himself, they encountered each other at Jahaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited, and the victory purchased by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Ejebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Bajan also were, and descended of Emorims, or Amorims: for Moses calleth the Bajanites also Amorites. And although Israhel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judea, being at this time, and after this victory, at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perilous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the Region of Bajan, or Tracoonitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade

Og, a person of exceeding strength and stature, and the only man of mark remaining of the antient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60 Cities walled and defended: lying between the Mountain of Hermion (which Mountain, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Sbirion, and the Amorites, Sbenin) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Bajan (who attended Moses coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sehon: for he and his sons perished, and all his Cities were taken and possessed. After this, Moses with-drawing himself back again to the Mountains of Abarim, left the prosecution of that war unto Jair the son of Mansse: who conquering the East parts of Bajan, to wit, the Kingdom of Argob, even unto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machati, 60 walled Cities, called the same after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which conquests afterward the half Tribe of Mansse possessed the North part as far as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sehon the Amorite, with the Mountains of Gilead adjoining, was given to Benben, and unto Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his death.

AFTER these victories, and while Israel journeyed in the valley of Aloab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it seemeth that Zalac King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) fought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by allying the Hebrews to the love of their daughters, and by persuading them to honour and serve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to bear them out of Aloab, and the Countries adjoining. The Israelites as they had ever been enclined, so were they now easily persuaded to these evil courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24,000 persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrews, were by his commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the son of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi, a Daughter of one of the chief of the Midianites, the Plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the love and kindness of his all-powersfulness, respecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in persecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews, become an Idolater) as he forgave the rest of Israel, and stayed his hand for his sake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbered the third time: and there remained of able men fit to bear arms

Num. 26. 31. 601,730. of which, as his last enterprise, he appointed 12000. to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who, together with the Moabites, practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that, fought to allure them (as before remembered) from the worship of the true God, to the service of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which Companies of 12000.

Num. 31. 8. Moses gave the charge to Phineas the son of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the vassals of Sehon, as appeared by Josiah. These five Princes of the Midianites slain by Eleazar, were at this time but the vassals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Eur, Hekem, Zur, Hur, and Rera, the Dukes of Sehon, saith Josiah. He slew also the men, male-children, and women: saving such as had not yet used the company of men, but these they saved, and dispersed them among the children of Israel to serve them.

And Moses having now lived 120. years, making both his own weakness of body known to the people, and his inability to travel: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God, from whom he received a new commandment to ascend the Mountains of Abarim, and thereon to render up his life: He hastened to settle the government in Josua, whom he persuaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the conquest begun, assuring him of Gods favour and assistance therein. And so having spent these his latter days after the conquest of Og, and Sehon King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to Saint Augustine) using both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the people, which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in knowledge, love, fear, and service of the all-powerful God: He blessed the twelve Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with several and most comfortable blessings: praising the greatness and goodness of him, unto whom in his prayers he commended them: He also commanded the Priests to lay up the Book of the Law, by the side of the Ark of God, The last that he indited, was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heavens, and I will speak, and let the Earth bear the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrows of this life, unto that Rest which never afterward hath disquiet, he was buried in the Land of Aloab, over against Beth-Peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day; which happened in the year of the World, 2554.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let us a little, for instruction, look back to the occasions of sundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choice of this people) he wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and natural appetites. And to we shall find that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural cause of the sorrows and loss, which befel himself, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he sought by cruel and ungodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortal men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's own daughter, to preserve that child, which afterward became the most wife, and of all men the most gentle and mild, the most excellently learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppressed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he fought by the strength of his men of War, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the dust. The grief which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own presence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to fly into Madian: the contention between the Shepherds of that place, and Jethro's Daughters, made him known to their Father; who not only entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that Solitary life of keeping of his Father-in-Law's sheep, far from the preass of the World, contenting himself (though bred as a Kings Son) with the Lot of a poor Herd-man, God found him out in that Desert wherein he first suffered him to live many years, the better to know the waies and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his will and divine pleasure for his return into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by God's direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembered. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence, but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many years after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the Men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Josua; with the sum of the History of Josua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers waies, as it were prepared to be their Enemies.

LIKE manner, if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the Wilderness, or afterward, we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were, prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham; and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Israelites) were mingled with them by mutual marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were, prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountains continued as far as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South: and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sons of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of it is said in the book: The War of the Lord Abraham (or inflamed) Zob, and the brooks of Arnon, Junius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genesis and Vulgar Edition names the Region of Suph, a Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he conjectureth. J. ii. 2. The Text, he readeth thus. Edreio dicit sol and so the in recessore bellora Jehova, contra Vahbum in Rogione Suph; Contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore it is spoken in respect of the battels of Jehova, against Valeb in the Country of Suph, and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he understands, that amongst the Wars which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the War of Sehon against Labeb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country near Arnon, out of the possession of the Amorites. For this Labeb was the immediate Predecessor of Edreio, who lived with Moses; though it be written that this Edreio was the Son of Lippor, and not of Labeb. For, it seems (as it is plain in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdoms were elective, and not successive. And as Junius in this Translation understandeth no special Book of the battels of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any special Book be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of Wars in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the book of Judges. Syracides, cap. 46. tells us plainly, that those battels of the Lord were fought by Joshua; It was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battels of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often pass over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other books written of the same matter at large; therefore it seemeth probable, that such a book as this there was; wherein the several victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with divine discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrates. For the Books of Henoch, howsoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddeus, and cited by Origen, πρωτον βιβλον, and by Tertullian.

That work also of the Patriarch Abraham, of formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Books remembered by Joshua, Chap. 10. vers. 13. and in the second of Samuel, Chap. 1. vers. 12. called the Book of Jessur, or Justerum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sun and Moon in the middle of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood till Israel had avenged themselves of their enemies; out of which also David took the Precept of teaching the Children of Judah, to exercise their Bows against their Enemies.

Some think this to be the Book of eternal Predestination, in which the just are written, according unto the sixty and ninth Psalm, vers. 28. where it is said; Let them be put out of the book of Life, neither let them be written with the Righteous. Hierom thinks that David by this Book, understood those of Sannul; Rabbi Solomon, that the Books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses are written. Others, that it is was the Book of Exodus. Others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary upon Joshua, by an unknown Author.

The Book of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron, Chap. 33. v. 18. and 19. Of this Book, also Iosephus conceives, that the Prophet Eliy was the Author.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Solomon, written by Asia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the Son of Solomon: As to the Books of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Jeedo the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron, Chap. 9. vers. 29. With these have the Books of Shemaiab and of Idlo, remembered in the second of Chron, Chap. 12. vers. 15. perished; and that of Jehu the Son of Hanani, of the acts of Jehoshaphat, cited in the second of Chron, Chap. 20. vers. 34. Also that Book of Solomon, which the Hebrews write Hagirim, of 5000. Verses, of which, that part called Canticum Canticorum, only remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this, divers others of Solomon's works have perished, as his Book of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembered by Origen, Josephus, Hierom, Cedrenus, Cicco Aculanus, Picus Mirandula, and others.

Of these, and other Books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Hierusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

§. VIII.

of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

When Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nibo; leaving the City of Asidian on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South-side of Arnon, having lost all his ancient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battel, God having given that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was antiently possit by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anac.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desert of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time pass those Mountains to the East of Bajan, but left their Country to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: so these Nations, which antiently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it self, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbab, which Arbab in Joshua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also been Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chief City was Aroer or Arnear near the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummims, which were of the fame antient Canaanites: and their chief City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendique Gigantes; Strong men, and fearful Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Province, and not far to the North of Aroer.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to

pray a passage through his Country, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest upon Valeb the Moabite, which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and usurpers, (themselves being of the sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withal, prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses incamped in the Country of his new conquests, to wit, the Plains of Atob, the two and fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses waisted with the multitude of his people and cattle. Towards him therefore having himself, they encountered each other at Jakaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited, and the victory pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Elfebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Bajan also were, and descended of Emoreus, or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Bajanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judea, being at this time, and after this victory, at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perilous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the Region of Bajan, or Tracoonitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og, a person of exceeding strength and stature, and the only man of mark remaining of the antient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60 Cities walled and defended: lying between the Mountain of Herman (which Mountain, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Sbirion, and the Amorites, Schenir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Bajan (who attended Moses coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sehon: for he and his sons perished, and all his Cities were taken and possit. After this, Moses with-drawing himself back again to the Mountains of Abarim, left the prosecution of that war unto Jair the son of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Bajan, to wit, the Kingdom of Argob, even unto the Nations of the Geshuri and Machati, 60-walled Cities, called the same after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which conquests afterward the half Tribe of Manasse possit the North part as far as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sehon the Amorite, with the Mountains of Gilead adjoining, was given to Reuben, and unto Gad.

of the troubles about the Medianites, and of Moses his death.

AFTER these victories, and while Israel sojourn'd in the valley of Aloab, the Medianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it seemeth that Elae King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) fought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their daughters, and by persuading them to honour and serve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to beat them out of Aloab, and the Countries adjoining. The Israelites as they had ever been inclined, to be they now easily persuaded to these evil courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24,000. persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrews, were by his commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the son of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi, a Daughter of one of the chief of the Medianites, the Plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let us a little, for instruction, look back to the occasions of sundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choice of this people) he wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and natural appetites. And so we shall find that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural cause of the sorrows and loss, which befel himself, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he fought by cruel and ungodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, God (whose providence cannot be rectified, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortal men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's own daughter, to preserve that child, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and mild, the most excellently learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppressed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he sought by the strength of his men of War, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the dust. The grief which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own presence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to fly into Madian: the contention between the Shepherds

The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by God's direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembered. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence, but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many years after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the Men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Josua; with the sum of the History of Josua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers waies, as it were prepared to be their Enemies.

IN like manner, if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the Wilderness, or afterward, we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were, prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham; and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites; and Israelites) were mingled with them by mutual marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were, prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountains continued as far as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South: and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sons of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of

Sem,

Seni, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither, in effect, but with one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part, were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and possessors of those Territories, by process of time divided into several Families and Names: whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzis, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabit the utter borders and Mountains of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hetites, and others, who took name after the sons of Canaan, and after whom the Country in general was still called.

As for the Hebrews which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Family, and strangers in that Country, especially the Israelites: and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or endure them, no more than the Philistines did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himself, being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them; especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now even they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites, as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves, and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so far possessed themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superior. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Esau the Edumians: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael the eldest son of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are joined, as of the same Nation, the Amalekites: whom though the more common opinion thinketh to have been a Tribe of Edom, because Esau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason convinceth it to have been otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong; whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endlessly war decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismael's eldest son Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petrea, called Nabathees. Now even as Abraham besought God to bless Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and perform it. For of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Havilah upon Tygris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petrea. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; it is not unlikely, but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of fear: because all Princes and States do not willingly permit any stranger or powerful Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so united in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to join themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumians only denied the Hebrews a passage, which the Moabites durst not deny: because their Country lay more open; and because themselves had lately been beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites their Country lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sebon and Og, Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong by reason of the mountains which divided it from Bashan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sebon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was, that the Moabites might hope, after such a time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plains lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soon as Sebon was slain, and that the King of Moab, Balaac, perceived that Moses allotted that Valley to the Tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites, by special occasion, were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authours of their Pedigrees, God permitted ted some enmities to be, as it were, prefiges of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed by the memory of old grudges: and withall, by some disdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest son of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest son of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second son, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houles, being natural men, might scorn to give place, much less to subject themselves to their inferiours, as they took it: and for a more aggravation, the illues of Esau, Prince of Edumaea, might keep in record, that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his Father's blessing also by him: and that Jacob, after reconciliation, came not unto him as he promised, into Seir or Edumaea.

So all in the posterity of Ismael, it might remain as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the infatigation of Sara, cast out into the Desert, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his Mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumians also, or Edomites, were by their Maternal line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau took two wives of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the daughter of Elon, the Hittite; and the other Abolibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon, the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumaea.

Lastly it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in process of time corrupted, and drawn from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Wars of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham (for Methuselah may be thought to be of a better Pedigree) we find four named by Moses: and one and thirty remembered by Joshua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoining, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a general consideration are to be understood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergisites, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Country of their habitation the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principle Families should be rooted out, and that his own people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Country, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternal name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Homer, of the Hevites, whom Simson and Levi slew, together with his Son Sichem, in revenge of their sisters ravishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures have remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which furnished Israel, as they encamped in the Wilderness, in the edge of Edumaea.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arrival had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petrea, or Nabathees, and thrust them over Arnon into the Desarts, the same whom Moses overthrew in the plains of Moab: at which time he took Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Presently after which victory, Og was also slain by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley between the Mountains Traceni, or Galaad, and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fifth was Adonisedek King of the Jebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Joshua nameth four other Kings.

Hobab,

Hobam, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Jarmuth.

Japia, King of Lachis: and Debir, King of Eglon, who were all Am-

Levites overthrown in battle; and hanged by Joshua. After this overthrow Joshua nameth

Jabin, King of Hazor, and Jobab, King of Midon: whom he also slaughtered, and took his Cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some dominion over the rest; for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before times was the head of all those Kingdoms.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feet of seventy Kings, enforcing them to gather crumbs under his Table: who, after Juda and Simcon had used the same execution upon himself, acknowledged it to be a just revenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died.

The last King named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Joshua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppressed twenty years after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin Barak (encouraged by Deborah) overtook; and his Captain Sisara had by Jael, the wife of Jieber the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Jabin himself perishing afterward in that war.

The Adamanites also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathea: to the South-East of the Dead Sea. They defended from Adaman Abrahams son, by Cethura. Raguel turnamed Gethuelsen or Jethers, said Josephus, called Jethro in Exodus; Kenis in the list of Judges, the son of Dakan, the grand-child of Jexanis, or Jokham, the great grand-child of Abraham; by Cethura, was Priest or Prince of the Adamanites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Niece, Moses married, and of whom, I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. He guided Moses in the Wilderness, and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Raguels surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Jabin the second, even now remembered.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong seats, and lived in the mountains of the Deserts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Hevite of Sichem

2. Arad of the South parts

3. Schon of Eshebon

4. Og of Basan

5. Adonibezek the Jebusite, King of Hierusalem.

6. Hobam of Hebron

7. Piram of Jarmuth

8. Japia of Lachis

9. Debir of Eglon

10. Jabin of Hazor

11. Jobab of Midon.

12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and

13. Jabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the Madianites these:

Zalmunna.

After the death of Barak, Judge of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings vexed Israel seven years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slain by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6. 7. and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himself laid hands upon Zebab and Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 20000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speak hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I find few that are named; and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied to a greater Nation, according unto the promise of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Madianites were numbered among them; were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur unto Hazor, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leave their barren Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that joyned with them (for so seem the Amalekites to have been, and so were the Madianites) themselves taking possession of a better soil in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petraea: For Naboth the eldest of those twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petraea; which was very fruitful, though adjoining to the Desert in which Moses wandered, afterward called Nabathea: the same which neighboureth Judea on the East-side. They also peopled a Province in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Naphtali (B) changed into (P.)

Kedor, the second of Ismaels sons, gave his own name to the East-part of Basan, or Batanea, which was afterward possessed by Manaasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountains Traceni, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Pliny, Cedareans.

Abdeel sat down in the Desert Arabia, near the Mountains which divide it from the Happy: and gave name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Misban was the Parent of the Masaman-cuses, near the Mountain Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Asthima: who joyned to the Orchens, near the Arabian gulf, where Ptolomy calleth Zagmais.

Of Dumae were the Dumceans, between the Adubens and Raabens: where the City Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Athrites, who bordered the Naphtaleans in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themancans, among the Arabian Mountains, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Jeir the Jureans, or Camathens: of whom Tobu was King in Davids time.

Of Naphtali, the Nabucian Arabians, inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadeser commanded, while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sons, was the Auceflor of the Cadumancans: who were afterward called Asite, because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians, Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans, Arctas, as names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterward they joyned with the Canaanites, and beat the Israelites near Cadesbarne. After the government of Othoniel, they joyned them with the Moabites, and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soon as Israel had rest, they should root out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Hazor to Shur.

In Davids time they took Sikkim in Simcon: but David followed them, and surprised them, recovering his prisoners and spoils. And yet, after David became King, they again vexed him, but to their own loss.

In Esaias time, as many of them as joyned to Edumaea, were wasted and displaced by the children of Simcon.

§. IV.

Of the institution of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

HERE lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and fostered far off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Judea. For if Pelagus, besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from rain and storm: and learned them withal to make a kind of Meale, and bread of Acorns, who before lived, for the most part, by Herbs and Roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched those times were, and how fallibly those Nations have vaunted of those their antiquities, accompanied not only with civil learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Esaias and S. Angustine have observed, that Prometheus flourished: quem propterea servat de hoc formasse homines homines, quia optimus sapientia doctor fuisse prohibetur; of whom it is reported, that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and to Theophrastus expounded the invention of fire ascribed to Prometheus. Ad inventa sapientia pertinere; To have reference to wise inventions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiter's fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Stars, and other celestial bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art so to use this fire, as thereby he gave life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning, that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived, had nothing else worthy of men, but external form and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrails the while devoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of heavenly bodies; for so it is said: Ideo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno celo quam longissimè affra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; that he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a clear sky discern a far off the settings and risings of the stars: though Diomedes Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diversly.

Of this man's knowledge Æschylus gives this testimony.

Africans makes Prometheus far more ancient, and but 94 years after Ogger. Porphyrius says, that he lived at once with Inachus, who lived with Isaac.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sons of Japetus, of whom though it be said, that they were born before Moses' days, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sons of Japetus, Æschylus finds two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evening, and so to the Evening Star. Also besides this Atlas of Libya, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountains which cross Africa, to the South of Morocco, Sur, and Hel, with the Sea adjoining, took name, which memory Plato in Critias beflowes on Atlas, the son of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to express divine knowledge. Nec vero Atlas sustinere celum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucasog, nec stellatus Cephæus cum uxore tradere, nisi divina cognitio nomen errorum fabule traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to bear up heaven, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cephæus with his wife to be stellified, unless their divine knowledge had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometimes express'd Time by Prometheus, sometime he took him for Saturn; as, Rheæ conjux alme Promethei. But that the Story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction, and that he lived about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and S. Augustine have not doubted: For the great judgment which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith S. Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades. Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moons course, of which Archaus the son of Orchomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Archaus, Arcadia in Peloponnesus took name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moon: Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be understood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any observation of the Moons course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Iacinus Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gave it Atlas of Libya: who, besides his gifts of mind, was a man of unequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V.

§. V.

of Deucalion and Phacton.

AND in this age of the World, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Thessaly, Crætus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the son of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyssey, makes Deucalion the son of Minos: but he must needs have meant some other Deucalion; for else either Odysseus was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Odysseus, after his return from Troy, feigned himself to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was son to this later Deucalion, the son of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus served in that war) and this Deucalion the son of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalion's time happened that great inundation in Thessaly: by which in effect every soul in those parts perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this flood in Thessaly, those people exceeded in all kind of wickedness and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foul sins perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that general destruction by the flood universal. Only Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be lovers of Vertue, of Justice, and of Religion. Of whom Ovid:

Non illo melior quisquam, nec amantior equi
Vir fuit: aut illa reverentior ulla deorum.

No man was Better, nor more just than he: Nor any woman godlier than thee.

It is also affirmed, that Prometheus foretold his son Deucalion of this over-flowing, and advised him to provide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himself a kind of Vessel, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward add the sending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily think that Story had been but an imitation of Noah's flood devised by the Greeks, did not the time so much differ, and S. Augustine with others of the Fathers and reverent Writers approve this Story of Deucalion. Among other his children, Deucalion had three two of note; Helen, of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas; and Atalanto, on whom Neptune is said to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no less strange and marvellous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened under Phacton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Istria, a Region in Italy, and about Cumæ, and the Mountains of Egvinus: of both which the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many strange fables.

of Hermes Trismegistus.

BUT of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus; and of the Greeks, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their own times, both S. Augustine and Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Thieves, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the god of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many works some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the son of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did Tetragrammaton; the other that Mercury, which flew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have delivered literature to the Egyptians; and to have given them laws. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying: That letters were not found out by that Mercury which flew Argus; but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Thevet, whom Philo Byblinus writeth Tautus; the Egyptians, Thoths; the Alexandrians, Thot, and the Greeks, (as before) Hermes. And to this Tautus, Sanvictio, who lived about the time of the war of Troy, gives the invention of letters what of what they did to natural Magicks: calling them coquards, workers by drugs. The Generous, Sorcerers and Incantors: Junius, Sapientes, Prestigiatores, & Magi. Magicians and Wife men here by him are taken in one sense: and Prestigiatours are such as dazeleth mens eyes, and make them seem to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some virtues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded; and the one taken for the other (Religion and Superstition having one face and countenance) so did the works and working of Moses, and of Pharo's Sorcerers appear in outward show, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Devil changeth himself into an Angel of light: and imitaterh in all he can the waies and workings of the most High. And yet, on the contrary, every work which surmounteth the wisdom of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the help or ministry of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to natural things, are such, as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to understand their hidden and best virtues, many things by them are brought to pass, which seem altogether impossible, and above nature or art: which two speculations of works of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Becubis, & opus de mercana: the one they call, Sapientiam naturæ; The Wisdom of nature: the other, Sapientiam divinitatis; The Wisdom of divinity: the one Jacob practised in breeding the pied Lambs in Aleopotamia; the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt, having received from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so far as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he used to his glory that gave them: assuming to himself nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also S. Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Jesseus, divers other famous men lived in the World, who, after their deaths, for their eminent virtues, and inventions, were numbered among the gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the use of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musical plays to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regain his favour, who brought barrenness and scarcity upon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple, and set it on fire: so did Erichoni- us institute the like games to Ziimera: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyl, in memory of her that first profit it out of the Olive.

In this age also Xanthus ravished Europa, and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpidon and Athius, which three are also given to Jupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the twelve labours are ascribed; native of Tyrinthia a City of Peloponnesus; (or as others say, onely nursed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phenicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philostratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manisfissum fit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Egyptium ad Gades pervenisse, & ibi suum statuisse terro (saith Philostratus;) It is manifest, that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the straits of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy soever they were that lived in the Days and Age of Moses, there was never any man, that was no more than Man, by whom it pleased God to work greater things; whom he favoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; never any man more familiar and conversant with Angels; never any more learned both in Divine and Humane knowledge; never a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that received and delivered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World Universal, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloved of God and men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fear of his enemies, showed him his glory, caused him to hear his voice, sanctified him with faithfulness and meekness, and chose him out of all men.

He is remembered among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetic: by Megasthenes, and Numerius the Pythagorean. The long lives which the Patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, remembered by Moses, Eficiens, Hieronymus, Agypius, Hecateus, Elanicius, Acylus, Phobus, and Alexander the Historian, confirm. The universal flood which God revealed unto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others, have testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Eficiens, and Sy-bida have approved. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecateus wrote a book of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abraham's passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the books of Moses. Epolemon writeth the very fame of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by divine power, he saith that Abraham, born in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, or Uricen, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrology of the Caldeans was invented. Is justitia pietateque sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) fit Deo gratus fuit, ut divino precepto in Pheniciam venerit, ibique habitaverit; For his justice and piety he was so pleasing unto God, as by his commandment he came into Phenicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Book and fifth Chapter, speaketh reverently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which do confirm the books of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I refer the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words: Moses enim affirmavit, dacebatque Egyptios non resse sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: Itemque Afros & Græcos, qui diis hominum figuram affinxerunt: id vero solum esse Deum, quod nos, & terram, & mare continet, quod celum, & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cujus profecto imaginem nemo sane mentis, alicujus earum rerum, que penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effigione repudata) dignum est Templum ac Delubrum constitutum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amiss, which attributed unto God, the images of beasts and cattel: Also that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred in giving unto their gods the shapes of men: whereas that only is God indeed, which containeth both us, the earth and sea, which we call heaven, the world, and the nature of all things, whose image, doubtless, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likeness of those things, which are amongst us. That therefore (all devising of Idols cast a- side) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his works and words: the same is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes, Laertius, Tamblicus, Philo Judeus, and Eusebius Cesariensis, and divided into four parts, viz. Mathematical, Natural, Divine, and Moral.

In the Mathematical part, which is distinguished into Geometry, Astronomy, Arithmetick, and Musick, the ancient Egyptians exceeded all others. For Geometry which is by interpretation, Measuring of grounds, was useful unto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflowed and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomy, the site of the Country being a level and spacious Plain, free and clear from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Stars.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnifie their gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Natural part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of natural things, differs little from Peripatetical Philosophy: teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies, and living creatures have their being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Stars have a certain sovent heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that rains proceed and be from mutations in the air; that the Planets have their proper souls, &c.

The Divine part of this wisdom, which is called Theology, teacheth and believeth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first original in Egypt; partly by means of the temperateness of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heat, are offensive; and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giveth in in those places: That the soul is immortal, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all gods, and that from this God, other gods are, as the Sun and Moon, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, because the true similitudes of the gods is not known; that many of the gods have been in the estate of mortal men, and after death, for their virtues and benefits bestowed on mankind, have been Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and Forms the Kings did carry in their Arms, when they obtained victory, were adored for gods: because under those Ensigns they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover the Egyptian Divines had a peculiar kind of writing, mystical, and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clement distributeth the whole sum of this later Egyptian learning into three several sorts, viz. Epipholar, which is used in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is expressed by letters Alphabetical in obscure and figurative words; as for example, where it is written: The Lis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moon doth by the Sun borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Divine beauty; the other Symbolical, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropical, and Enigmatical: Imitative, which delineeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle, the Sun; and by the Horns of the Moon, the Moon itself: Tropical or transferent, which applies the divers forms and figures of natural bodies or creatures, to signify the dignities, fortunes, conditions, virtues, vices, affections, and actions of their gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Divines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sun, the picture of the Bird Lis signifieth the Moon: by the form of a Man, Prudence, and Skillfulness: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood: Enigmatical is a composition, or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which fence, the monstrous Image of a Lions body: having a Mans head, was graven on their Temples and Altars, to signify, that to men all divine things are Enigmatical and obscure. So the Image of the Sun set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liveth as well in the Waters, as on Land) expretheth, that the Sun nourisheth Meteors in the Air, as well from the Waters, as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Ear, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have been delighted with this kind of writing. For Phereides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatened Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his kingdom; unless he would acknowledge subjection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouse, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Ploughshare: which Orontepagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signify, that by the Mouse, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their air: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their Lands were signified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their Sovereign Lord. But Xyphodres made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a Bird through the aire, or creep into holes as a Mouse, or run into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his arms, but either be slain, or being made Captives, fill his grounds. The same History is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

The fourth and last part, which is Moral and Politick, doth contain especially the Laws, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus devised: who in his Books or Dialogues of Pimander and Astlepius, hath written in many things of God, worthy of admiration; as well (saith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearful day of Judgment: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Jamblicus in his Books of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for their Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menetius, affirmeth, that this Mercury was not only the Inventor of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called the Wisdom of the Egyptians, before remembered: and that he wrote of that subject 36525 Books or Pages. Of which there were numbered, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Books; of Aereal Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestial a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptian language converted by certain learned Philosophers into natural Greek, they seemed to have been first written in that Tongue. Clement Alexandrinus writeth, l. 6.

writeth, that among the Books of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. Of Physick, six Books: of the orders of Priests, ten; and of Astrology, four.

§. VIII.

A Brief of the History of Josua; and of the space between him and Othoniel; and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Controversaries to Josua: and of the breach of Faith.

AFTER the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth year of the Egression, in the first month called Nisan, or March, Josua, the son of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdom, took on him the government of Israel: God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to pass the River of Jordan, and to possess and divide among the Israelites, the land promised.

The beginning of Josua's rule, Saint Augustine dates with the reign of Amraph, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicily, when Danaus governed the Argives; and Erichonius, Athenis, Josua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent over Jordan certain discoverers to view the seat and strength of Jerico, the next City unto him on the other side of the River, which he was to pass over. Which discoverers being saved, and sent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because she kept a Tavern or Victualling-house, made Josua know, that the inhabitants of Jerico, and those of the Country about it, hearing of the approach of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the return of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth year after the Egression, Josua removed from Shittim in the plains of Moab, and drew down his Army to the banks of the River Jordan; and gave them commandment to put themselves in order to follow the Ark of God, when the Levites took it up, and moved towards the River, giving them withal this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his favour and presence, who is Lord of all the world, when the River of Jordan should be cut off and divided, and the waters coming from above should stand still in a heap, whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might pass over into the Land of Canaan with dry feet.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Covenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and, as we call it in this age, to lead in the Vanguard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and Country, and Cities of the Amorites by the help of the rest, conquered for them: it agreed with justice and equality, that Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first month Nisan, or March, they passed over to the other side, taking with them twelve stones from the dry ground in the midst of the River: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set up at Gilgal, on the East-side of the city of Jerico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Josua gave commandment, that all born in the last fortieth year in the Deserts should be circumcised, which ceremony to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giveth for cause, The peoples contempt of their Superiors. Thomas excuseth it in this sort: That the Israelites knew not the certain time of their removing from one place to another: Danasseen, That it was not needful by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such times as they lived by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same month, the children of Israel celebrated the Passover now the third time; first, at their leaving Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which, being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Country, and having, as it were, surfeited on Manna, they parched of the Corn of the Land, being not yet full ripe, and eat thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Josua perform the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gave to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three several times; first, by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the half Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands over Jordan; secondly, by Josua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth year of his government; proved in the 14. of Josua. v. 10. and a third division was made to the other seven Tribes at Shilo, where Josua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Josua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Story I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the war, those little Kings, or reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custom of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wisdom and foresight, they left those of their own Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their own defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat far off, might again have been quenched, ere it could spread it self so far as their own Territories and Cities. But after such time as Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31 Kings (all which at length perished in that war) joynd themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendered themselves to Josua. One ly (the rest looking on to the success) namely, the King of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jakmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Army being by Josua surprized and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, and hopeles of mercy by submission, creeping into a Cave under ground, were thence by Josua drawn forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also took Atakkedath, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relief whereof Horam King of Gazar hastened, and perished. After which Josua possessed himself of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countries were possesst, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counsels of necessity, united themselves, to make one gross strength and body of an Army: which Jabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Josua discovered, as the same rested near the Lake of Merom, he used such diligence, as he came on them unawares; and obtaining absolute victory over them, he prosecuted the same to the utmost effect. And besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor onely, reserving the rest for Israel to inhabit and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Josua shewed himself a skilful man of War, for that in those ancient times he used the stratagem of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Ama- rites, which attempted Gibeon by surprise. For he marched all night from his Camp at Jef. 10. 1 Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when he overthrew Jabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great City of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this war, were exceeding admirable as the stay of the River Jordan at the Springs, so as the Army of Israel past it with a dry foot; the fall of Jerico by the sound of the Horns; the showers of Hale-stones, which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished than by the sword of Israel: again, the arrest of the Sun in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lightened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a work only proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the passage between Josua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evasion, it admitteth no intrusion, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousness, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Hevites, expressly and by name, by the commandment of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and counterfeits, and that they did over-reach, and as it were, deride Josua, and the Princes of Israel, by feigning to be sent as Embassadors from a far Country, in which travel their cloths were worn, their bread mouldie, which they avowed to have been warm for newness when they first set out; their barrels and bottles of wine broken; their shoes patch'd; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Josua having sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel, he durst not, though urged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but he spared both their lives, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if ever man had warrant to break faith, and to retract his promise made, Josua had it. For first, the commandment which he received from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by far the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, he might justly have put these men to the sword, and have sack'd their Cities, if there be any evasion from a promise made, whereof the living God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gave peace, because he knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the Hevites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gave faith, and to a Nation which came from far, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and over Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these crafty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, believed what they had said, and counselled not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were known Idolaters, and served those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an apostate Religion, as all Worshipers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they believed not. I say therefore, that if ever man might have served himself by any evasion or distinction, Josua might justly have done it. For he needed not in this case the help of Equivocation or Mental Reservation. For what he swore, he swore in good Faith; but he swore nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithless subtilty of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the Name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworn it, were worshippers of the Devil.

For it is not, as faithless men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the Name of the living Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a Prince; but the Promise in the Name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect: we therein profess that we fear him not, and that we set him at naught, and despise him. If he that without reservation of Honour, giveth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth, in point of Honour, give the lie to the King himself, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he break Faith with God, that giveth Faith in the presence of God, prometh in his Name, and makes him a witness of the Covenant made?

Our of doubt, it is a fearful thing for a Son to break the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdom, to break those Contracts which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick faith. For though it were 400 years after Josua, that Saul, even out of devotion, slaughter'd some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgot not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworn in his Name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Saul's sons were delivered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equivocation, to swear one thing by the Name of the living God, and to reserve in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Servants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not only be made uncertain, but all the chains whereby free-men are tied in the world, be torn asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot pass) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that wars take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it, or ought it to be, that makes an oath thus powerful, but this; That he that sweareth by the Name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true, whom he calleth for a Witness, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poor evasions, which play with the severity of Gods Commandments in this kind: But this indeed is the best answer, That he breaks no faith, that hath none to break. For whoever hath faith and the fear of God, dares not do it.

The Christians in the Holy Land, when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not only loose it again, but were soon after beaten out of the Holy Land it self: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reverend Bishop which wrote that Story) that Almerick the fifth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Eldadech, and his Vicegerent. The Soldan Sanan, who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk Syraelon to their aid: whose Nephew Saladin, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Cross (the very Cross, say they, that Christ died on) give them victory over Saladin, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge, seeing they had sworn themselves in his Name that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the Holy Ghost. That be that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, flayeth the soul: how much more perilous is it (if any peril be greater than to destroy the soul) to swear a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that persuaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungary after his great victory over Amurath the Turk, and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most advantageous that ever was made for the Christians, to break his Faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the war. And though the said King was far stronger in the field than ever; yet he lost the battel with 30000 Christians, and his own life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods judgments upon faith-breakers; be it against Infidels, Turks, or Christians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oaths now-a-dayes, is rather made a matter of custom, than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable, That it pleased God to leave to many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by foreseeing their Idolatry; and as it is said in the Scriptures, To be thorns in their eyes to prove them, and to teach them to make War. For these Cities hereafter named did not enely remain in the Canaanites possession all the time of Joshua; but soon after his death the children of Dan were beaten out of the plain Countries; and enforced to inhabit the Mountains, and places of hardest access. And those of Juda were not able to be masters of their own Vallies; because as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principal Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adjoining unto Juda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistines: as many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he sought the battels of the Lord?

Neither did the children of Manasse over Jordan expel the Geshurites, nor the Achaabites; which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nephthalims possesse themselves of Bethshean, nor of Beiknab; but they enforced those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asaph expel the Zidonians, nor those of Acha, or Acon, Athlab, Athzib, Heblab, Aphik, & Kebech, nor enforced them to tribute. No more could Zabulon enjoy Kitron, and Nahalol, but received tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims; and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taacnah, Dor, Ibleam, and Megaddo; yea Hierusalem itself did the Jehoseph defend above four hundred years, even till David's time.

Now Joshua lived one hundred and ten years, eighteen of which he governed Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth divers to conjecture diversly of the continuance. Josephus gives him five and twenty years: Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twenty; and Massius six and twenty: Joannes Lucidus, seventeen: Cajetanus, ten: Eusebius giveth him seven and twenty: and so doth S. Augustine: Melancthon, two and thirty: Codoman, five and twenty. But whereas there passed 480 years from the delivery of Israel out of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that we allow to Joshua onely eighteen of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to me seems the most likely, and, as I think, a well approved opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480. years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of error, such as have inserted years between Joshua and Othoniel, of whom Eusebius finds eight years, to which Arius Montanus adds, adhereth; and for which he giveth his reason in his four and twentieth and last Chapter upon Joshua: Bunting reckons it nine years: Bucolser and Reusner but one; Codoman, twenty; and Nicephorus no less than three and thirty; whereas following the sure direction of these 480. years, there can be no void years found between Joshua and Othoniel, unless they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed unto Joshua by the account already specified. The praises and acts of Joshua are briefly written in the six and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he sought the battels of the Lord?

That he wrote the book called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, verse 26. And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the Law of God: which seemeth rather to have been meant by the covenant which Joshua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serve and obey the Lord: which promise Joshua caused to be written in the book of the Law: and of this opinion were Cajetan and Abulenfi: Theodoret doth likewise conceive, that the book of Joshua was collected out of an antient Volume, intitled Liber Justorum, remembered by Joshua himself; and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon these words of the 26. Verse, And Joshua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to prove it: for when the people had answered Joshua; The Lord our God will be served, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Joshua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the same in the book of the Law of God.

There lived at once with Joshua, Erilbonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fifty Daughters of Danaus (as it is said) slew the fifty sons of Egypt, all but Lynceus, who succeeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived also with Joshua, Phenix, and Cadmus, and neer the end of Joshua's life, Jupiter is said to have ravished Europa the daughter of Phenix (afterward married to Asterius King of Crete) and begat on her Atisus, Radamantius, and Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this ravishment to be committed by Antaeus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Atisus was father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idmon, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same Trojan war. And so doth Nestor reckon up in the Council of the Greeks, Theseus and Pericles for men of Antiquity and of Ages past: Atisus being yet more ancient than any of these: but here of clew here.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israel that were planted in the borders of Phoenicia, with sundry Stories depending upon those places.

S. I.

The Promise to the description of the whole Land of Canaan; with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

THE Story of the Judges ought to follow that of Joshua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Jews was governed by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, shall be remembered when we come to the description of Samaria: but because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Story past, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be understood, and conceived. To which purpose (besides the addition of the neighbour Countries) I have bestowed on every Tribe his proper portion: and do shew what Cities and Places of strength were by the Jews obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when ungrateful for his many graces, they at sundry times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deaf and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina bonitas (saith Augustine) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalem adhibet severitatem, ne aeternam justè inferat ultionem; The divine goodness is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully use temporal severity, that it may not justly bring upon us eternal vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I have added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdoms and Common-wealths to help my self herein, I have perused divers of the best Authors upon this subject: among whom, because I find so great disagreement in many particulars, I have rather in such cases adventured to follow mine own reason, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And because Canaan, with Palsgina of the Philistines, and the Lands of Og and Sehon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Provinces of Syria: it shall be necessary, first to divide and bound the general, and so to descend to this particular, now called the Holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was antiently taken, embraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, but called Leucogryans, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idumea, towards the South, Tigris towards the Sun-rising, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Desert, and Arabia Petraea, that Region also which the Greeks call Mesopotamia, the Hebrews Syria, of the two Rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aran Naharajon is expounded: also Padan Aram; that is, Jugum Syria, because the two Rivers goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Antiochias

Edessa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Celestria, which the Latins call Syria Cava, because it lay in that fruitful Valley between the Mountains of Lybanus, and Antilibanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others, were seated. Then Damascena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the City Damascus, and the Mountains of Lybanus, the Regal seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoining to it was the Province of Sephene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobah: over which Adadazer commanded in Solomon's time. Then Phenicia, and the people Syrachens: and lastly, Syria Palaestina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolomy maketh Judea also a part: and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syrea Judea.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

But that Land which was antiently Canaan, taketh a part of Phenicia, and stretcheth from behind Lybanus to the great Deserts between Idumea and Egypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountains of Hermom, Galaad, and Arnon towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi, or Tracoonitis, and Ptoleme, Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Son of Cham: Et lingua appellata suis Canaan; The language was also called seir, called Canaan, saith Montanus; and after Hebræa of the Hebrews: who took name from Heber, the Son of Sale, according to Saint catib. 6. 1.

Augustine. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noah's Sons, who past over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith he, is as much as transiens, or transmissus of going, or passing over. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Judea from Juda; and then afterwards intitled the Holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was Born, and Buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four; namely, unto Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. Galilee is double, the superior called Gentium, and the inferior: and that Galilee and Judea are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phenicia.

Now besides these Provinces of Phenicia, and Palestina (both which the River of Jordan boundeth; saving that Phenicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also of the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Hermom, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of half Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: as well because antiently possessed by the Azorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites; which Eastermost parts are again divided into Basan, or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Machati, Geshuri, Argobe, Hur. They are known to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in general; and by the names of Tracoonitis, Pieria Batanea, &c. of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, for these be his words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar untill Azrah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countree North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goest unto Sodom and Comorah, and Admah, and Seboim, even unto Lasha: by which words Moses seteth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomy it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places wherein the foot of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: your coast shall be from the Wilderness, and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countree North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon; and the Wilderness for Gerar and Azza, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth itself both over Arabia Petraea, and the Desert, as far as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites never possessed; nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceive, that by the River Perah was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Joshua: Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these Nations, that remain to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great Sea Westward.

And though it be true, that David greatly enlarged the Territory of the Holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put in gentes amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so far to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavill, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and service, it pleased him not only to inclose them within that Territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subject them unto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves also served and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting enjoyment thereof, to wit, as long as the heavens were above the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceeding, and subsequent; which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the merciful goodness of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, then while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleventh of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandments was a condition joynted to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the Land, whither ye go to possess it. Also that you may prolong your dates in the Land which the Lord swore unto your fathers, &c.

Deut. 11.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heavens were above the earth. For if ye keep diligently, saith he, all these commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandments, and their falling away from the worship of his almighty Majesty, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon: For, saith he, Offendit promissionem precipiam non esse de hoc politico Regno; He sheweth that his chief promise is not of a civil Kingdom. To which agrees that answer which S. Hierome made to a certain Heretic in his Epistle ad Dardannum, who accused S. Hierome, that he overthrew the reputation of the Jews Story, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat vivendum terram que in celis est; (that is) Only to that land of the living which is in heaven. Quoniam tota Judeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. miliarium, latitudinem vero 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, urbes, & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam a Judeis occupata, sed tantum divina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Jews is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, and in these are countries, places, cities, and many towns, which the Jews never possessed, but were only granted by divine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh upon Ezay, touching the blessings promised unto Hierusalem, where he hath these words: De quo dicitur Hierusalem nequaquam in Palestina regione petendam, qua totius Provincie, deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & penuriam patitur sitis: ita ut celestibus natur plovius, & raritatem fontium cisternarum extrucone soletur: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, festinaverunt stridit. yer tui: From whence, saith he, we learn, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, and ragged with craggy mountains, vine, and ragged with craggy mountains, and suffereth the penny of thirst: so as it pre-serveth rain water, and supplieth the scarcity of command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the Land, whither ye go Jalema

Deut. 11.

Ez. 4. 1.

Idolatriam in Codd. hndis, to which it is said, They builded Laws before: to Isa. St. Hierome; where also he is in mistake, he thus expounded himself: Neque hoc duo in suggestionem verba Judaei, et Hieronimus Syoniam in verba: aut quo auctoritas historice exactione que fundamentum est intelligentia figurativa: sed in actionem figurativam Judaeorum, qui Syonagoga arguuntur latitudinis Lechia, per formam: Si enim videmus tantum separatur iterum, & non figuram: crepantem sperantem terram promissionis latet & in monumentum. Neither (with him) by this to argue the land of Judaea; as the heretical Syonians doth believe: or to take away the truth of the history, which is the foundation of Jewish monotheism: but to beat down the pride of the Jews, which enlarge the straits of this prophetic simile than the breadth of the Church: for if they follow only the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them show the land of promise, sowing with Balaam, and Laila.

It is it may also be gathered, howsoever it be said, (liking the West-bound in the place, Dom. 11. 24. had his truth in the attested sense, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East-bound, should be taken only in a spiritual sense) yet nevertheless that Hierome's opinion inclineth to this last, this Perath were not to be understood Euphrates, and that the promise itself was never larger: much less the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of the eastly Land, because Asher, Nephthali, and Zabulon held the Northernmost part, and were rated in Phenicia, I will begin with the three, taking Asher for the first: as which I have yet before I speak, I must add with the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names, by reason of the divers fancies of Translators, are diversely exprest, so that it is difficult they may seem divers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Eastern Language) is partly because the great Letters of the Hebrew want vowels, that the Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly because the Antient exprest or divided divers consonants, otherwise than the later do think fit.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

§. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

The Asherites descended of Asher the son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odd persons, all men above twenty years of age, and able to bear arms, at the time when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children, 52400. bodies fit for the wars: which past the river of Arnon into the Plains of Moab, and after the conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phenicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, unto Pholomais Acon along the Sea-coast, containing thirty English miles, or thereabout: and from the Mid-land Sea to the East border some twelve miles: though Antoninus makes it some what larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in Wine, Oyl, and Wheat, besides the Balsamm, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecy, Asher pinguis panis: Concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat: And he shall give pleasures for a King.

§. II.

Of Zidon.

The first City seated on the North border of the Territory of Asher, was Zidon, which Isaiah calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greeks and Quintus make Agenor the founder thereof: and Isidore derives the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath been called Zidonia. But that it was far more ancient, Moses, Isaiah, and Josephus witness, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's sons: and so strong it was in Isaiah's time, as neither did himself attempt it, neither could the Asherites, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Christ: and by a City interchangeably governed, by their own Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Esaie, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted, both by the enemies enemies Sword, and by the Pestilence. Zidon is seated on the very wath of the Lebanon Sea, which is a part of the Mediterranean or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the City of Berythus, and the River Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarbat, which standeth between it and Tyre: the distance between which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, Guth Seignior: but Padianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twenty miles. This difference of distance as well between these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to divide any new Scale to the Map and Description of the Holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenor's time there is no memory: the story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient than Tyre: which was also built by the Zidonians. For Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon; and a City subject to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacy, and became far more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Solomon and Zorobabel their principal workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of Learning, so did it in all other Mechanical Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wise Zidonians. The City was both by nature and art exceeding strong, having a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing upon an unaccessible Rock, and compassed by the Sea, which affter the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South-side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also lent many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote: as unto Thebes, and Sephra, Cities of Beotia in Greece. Strabo and Pliny give the Zidonians the invention of Glass, which they used to make of those Sands which are taken out of the River Belus, falling into the Atticrivan Sea, near Pholomais, or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those clear Glasses which they make at Aturana: of which St. Hierom and Pliny Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitarius officinis nobilis; Zidon a famous Glass-maker, or a skilful worker in Glass-houses. They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astarte, which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1 Sam. 31. 10. and Judg. 10. 6.) to have yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1 Reg. 11. 5. in the story of Solomon's Idolatry: where Astarte is called the god of the Zidonians; and 1 Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Abab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said, that he marrying Jezebel the daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Divers Baals and divers Astartes in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plural names of Eadim, and Astarte, 1 Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for even the name Astarte, as I am informed by a skilful Hebraist, is plural; the singular being Astarte: whence Judg. 2. 12. the Septuagint read idolatriam was idolatrias. They worshipped the Astartes. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals and Astartes, may be diversly understood: either in respect of the diversity of the forms of the Images, or of the worship in divers places, or of the stories depending upon them: which (as fables use to be) were doubtless in divers Cities divers. Augustine quest. 19. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Juno by such a name as Astarte. Tully, lib. 2. de Nat. Deorum, making divers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte: whom he makes to be born of Tyrrus and Syria, and to have been the wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius, 2. Saturn. cap. 21. says, that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Affyrans: and Hierome upon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seem that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewail her husband Adonis: as also the Grecians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourning for Adonis the fair, dead is Adonis the fair. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose loss of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus loss of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Amunus: which word may seem to be the same with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But howsoever the Zidonians were thus antiently fostered with the milk of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine at the Gospel of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jews: who had been taught by Moses and the Prophets so many years, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke: Woe be to thee Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyne and Zidon, they had repented long ago, &c. but I say unto you, it shall be easier for Tyne and Zidon, at the day of judgment, than for you.

It received a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Dioceses of Tyre. But in the year of our Redemption 628, it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and continued in their possession till Baldwin the first, then King of the Danes and Normans, who came with a Fleet to visit the Holy Land, and took Port at Joppa, it was again recovered, the commandment thereof being given to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Country. And again in the year 1250, it was re-edified and strengthened by Lodowick the French King: while he spent four year in the War of the Holy Land. Lastly, in the year 1289, it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turk, and hath the name of Zai.

§. III.

Of Sarepta, with a brief History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or rather the Hebrew, Sarpath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Naor, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent Wine growing near it: of which Zidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazeta, Chia, Falerna, Quaeque Sareptano palmitis misca bibas.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine, Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop, of the Dioceses of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, faith Postellus.

Nor far from Sarepta was situated that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of ships commanded, and gave the law over all the Mediterranean Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatness and power, the Tyrians erected Vicia, Lepcis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Orbs antiqua suit, Tyrii tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colony of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italy, Nola: in Asia the less Dromos Achillis, which City the Scholiast of Apollonius placeth near the River Phyllis, in Bythima.

It had antiently the name of Zor, or Zor: and so it is written in Josua the 19. taking name from the situation; because built on a high Rock, sharp at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra, as Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrum Sarraenum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high hill, whereof many ruins remain to this day; the place being still known by the name of the antient Tyre: and because it was a Colony of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thiras the son of Isabel to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very antient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious City, whose antiquity is of antient days?) yet that Thiras the son of Isabel set himself in the bosom of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region, I see nothing to persuade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the work of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Josephus and Eusebius make this City elder than Solomon's Temple 240 years: Cicero 361. who also addeth, that Tyrus the wife of Agenor, gave it her name: but of Agenor I will speak more at large in the story of their Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island 700. paces from the Continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the midst of the Seas, as some read, or as others, in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence he called it situata at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it, the Mart of the people for many Isles: and Esay, a Mart of the Nations: and so proud, wealthy, and magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manufacture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, faith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dog, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura, the the hair of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the Idols that Zidon did: saying that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crown of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remain his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonian Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountain of old Tyre: where he might perform that ceremony. But this availed not: for Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Town, which being denied, he, as one whom no peril could fear, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, & so many weighty stones from the old City of Tyre adjoining, as, notwithstanding that his materials were often wast with away with the strength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he never rested, till he had made a foot-passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their walls, he overtopped them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000. more to be hung up in a rank all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution upon cold blood he performed (as some Authors affirm) upon the issues of those slaves which had formerly slain all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, Josephus remembreth: and how Sababallat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Provincial Governour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who having married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Jaddan the high Priest of Hiersusalem, obtained of Alexander, that a Temple might be built on the Mountain Gazium over Samaria: that the forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his son in law Manasse, whom the Jews oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sababallat, whom Guil. Tyrius called Sanabula, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that city. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three-score ships of war held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve sail scattered that fleet, and took 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before it by his Lieutenants five years, but with ill success. And this siege Menander Ephesus, cited by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as he found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrians (which he said Menander converted into Greek) adding, that Euhelus, whom Tyrians called Heliens, was then King of Tyre, having governed the same six and twenty years. Soon after this repulse of Salmanasser, and about 200. years before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor, at such time as he destroyed Hiersusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that despairful work, of joining it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same sawley and passage was again broken down, and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many years, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did those Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, faith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Esay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end, and after 12. years siege or more, the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembering over-late the predictions and threatenings of Gods Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of ships, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained: and with their wives, children, and portable riches, fled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfy so many labours and perils, or any person upon whom to avenge themselves for the loss of so many bodies in that War: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious over the Egyptians: and gave him that Kingdom and the spoil thereof, as it were, in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierom noteth, that God leaveth not the good deeds of the Heathen unrequited: who though they cannot hope for any laudable worldly action, to attain unto that eternal happiness reserved for their Servants and Saints: yet such is the boundless goodness of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly goods and temporal blessings.

Now of this enterprize of Nabuchodonosor's against Tyre, prophane Historians have not been silent. For both Dioctes, and Philostratus (as Josephus citeth them) the one in his second Book, the other in his Phenician Histories remember it.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this City of Tyre, repaired and recovered it self again: and continued in great glory about 300. years, even to the coming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith near 600. years: the Archbishop whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarch of Hierusalem only, who within his own Diocese had fourteen great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cesarea Philippi, Berytus, Eblyus, Bortys, Tripolis, Orthofia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus, (or Tortofa) and Maraclea. But in the year 836. it was with the rest of that beautiful Region of Phenicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruel and faithless Saracens: under the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered, with the other Palestine Cities, 428. years.

In the year 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem; but in vain: yet in the year 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarch of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venicians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was again recovered, and subjected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. years.

Finally, in the year 1189. Saladine having first taken Hierusalem, removed his whole Army, and fate down before Tyre: drawing his fleet of Ships and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then only remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certain rafters of timber, fished, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleet, and fallyed out resolutely upon his Army, slew fo great numbers of them; and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two years after which victory the body of that famous Frederick Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies over a River unfordable perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Origen, garnished and graven with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. years before therein buried: but in the year 1289. the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turks.

II. IV.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

The third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtain, on the South bound of Affer was Acho, which was the antient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authors affirm, that it took name from Acon the brother of Ptolomie. Pliny calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colony of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hadiptos.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais, after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies, which City also, as it is 1 Mac. 11, another of the Ptolomies, infideliouly wrested from his son in law Alexander, which called himself the son of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra, daughter of the said Ptolomie, not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Machabeus treacherouly surpris'd and slain, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidiousness of Tryphon, whom soon after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and, by like reason, about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander in the war against Demetrius, one of the sons of Antiochus the great, with whom Ptolomy joynd, overthrow and treacherouly murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented unto his father in law Ptolomie: who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason above three daies, for God struck him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regal seat; two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea, and the Port, for safety and capacity, not inferior to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Hierusalem some four and thirty miles: four miles to the North from the Mountain Carwel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lambertii: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty miles.

In the midst of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Belzebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flier, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetual light like unto that called Pharus in Egypt: to give comfort in the night to those ships which came near and fought that part. It had in it a Bishop's seat of the Diocese of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the year 636. (a fatal year to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracene. In the year 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the help of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand hundred fourscore and seven, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the year of Christ, one thousand hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the year 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entered, sack'd, and utterly demolished: though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

II. V.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is a Castle of St. George seated, in which he was born: the Valley adjoining bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leave every man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successors royally have continued, should have born his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those daies, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or person feigned. The place is described by Adricomius in his description of Affer, to have been in the fields of Libanus, between the River Adonis and Zidon: his own words are these: Hoc locus qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur non longe à Deryto, memorant inclutam Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regi filium ab immanissimo Dracone asseruisse: eamque maculata belia parenti restituisse. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata: In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did rescue the Kings daughter from a huge Dragon: and having killed the beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deed a Church was after built there: Thus far Adricomius. His Authors he citeth Lodovici Romanus, Patrie Navigationum l. c. 3. and Eribenbach l. i. c. 5. The Valley under this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorical, figuring the victory of Christ, than except of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

II. VI.

Of Aziba, Sandalium, and others.

Between Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea-coast, was the strong City of Aziba, or Achazib, which S. Hierome called Achzib, and Josephus Ecdippa, one of those which defended it self against the Asserites. Belforsius finds Aziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not from whence he had it.

The twelve Searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, travelled as far to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechob, as also Berothe, which by Ezechiel, cap. 47. ver. 16. is placed in the North borders, belonging in David's time to the King Hadarbezer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel, chap. 8. ver. 8. and chap. 10. ver. 6. and it defended it self against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achniph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling down, slew seven and twenty thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had been slaughtered by the Israelites, under the conduct of Abah. Here Junius finds that the Philistines encamped a little before the battel at Gilboa, though in this note upon the first of Samuel the 9. & 11. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battel the Ark was taken) to have been in Juda. Of which Jos. 15. and 53. & in the second of Kings 12. 17. he reads, Fortiter, for in Aphek. Where others covert it, Percutiens Syros in Aphek.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it when he besieged Tyre: and let it on a point of Land which extendeth it self into the Sea, between Arziba and Tyre: which Cattle Baldwine in the first rebuilt and fortified; in the year of Christ 1157. when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of water, which Solomon remembereth, called the Well of living Water: from whence not only all the fields and plains about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn: but the same Spring, which hath not above a bow-shot of ground to travel till it recover the Sea, driveth six great Mills in that short passage, faith Ezechard.

Within the Land, and to the East of Arziba, and Sandalum, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, under the Mountains of Tyre, the City of Arzaph, or Axah, or after S. Hierome, Arzaph, a City of great strength, whose King, amongst the rest, was slain by Josiah, at the waters of Acheron.

§. VII.

Of Thoron, Gisfala, and some other places.

Further into the Land, towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Ungo de Santo Ademare built on the Eastermost hills of Tyre, in the year 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adjoining being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the story of the Wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappel, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Confable to Baldwine the 3. King of Hierusalem, lieth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Affer: whereof four are seated almost of equal distance from each other: to wit, Castrum Lampertis, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium and Belfort: the first neer the Sea under the hills of Saron, the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and fellowship of the Teutonic, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possessed the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which Order was in Ptolomae Achon. The first fortels was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the River Naar, neer the City Rama: of which in this Tribe Jos. 19. 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels. Corin. 1. 4. from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great loss and dishonour repelled.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which S. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (or Rechab) not far thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod furnished the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabot, Quod Syrorum lingua displicere significat (faith Weissenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others think this Chabot (or Calbul) containing a circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compass of the Holy Land, though bordering Affer on the North side: as it is said, 1. Reg. 9. 11. That they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Country: for as it was not lawful, say they, to give to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears, 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David from the Syri Rechobee, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equal distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Gisfala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Gisfala was made famous by John the son of Levi, who from a mean estate gathering together four hundred Thieves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee, at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judaea: by whose practice Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second Book of those Wars. This John betraying, in all he could, the City of Gisfala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gave opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same time forc'd it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Josephus authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They hide also the Cities of Cana Major, and Cader (or Cades) of

of the first was that Syro-phenician, whose Daughter Christ delivered of the evil spirit. Neer the other, they say, it was that Jonathas Machabees overthrew the Army of Demetrius.

There are, besides these fore-named Cities, within the Tribe of Affer, divers others: as on the South border, and near the Sea, Atsall, or Misheal: within the Land (a) Befala, (b) Bethdagon, and Bethemec, standing on the South border between Affer and Zabulon: on the North side joyning to Syro-phenicia, is the City of Hethalon, or Chetblon, the utmost of the Holy Land that way: under which, towards the Sea, is Chali, and then (c) Enoch, supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his son Enoch, but without probability, as Haver formerly proved. There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chammon, of which Jos. 19. 28. where also we read of Nehiel, Rama, Alamelee, and Beron: the Cities of Alcab, or Chelcab, Haddon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we have already mentioned, were by the Afferites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Cananites, mention is made, Jud. 1. 30. to which out of Josiah we may add Ebron, Ambad, and others, on which no story dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

§. VIII.

Of the Rivers and Mountains of Affer.

The Rivers to the North of Affer, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Zeigler joyneth Lycus; Ptolomy, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neer Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus draws near unto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding where Ptolomy doth, between Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a River called Fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Elenherus: for which he also citeth Pliny, and the first of Machabees the eleventh Chapter; but neither of those authorities prove Elenherus to be in Affer: for this River falleth into the Sea at the Ille of Aradus: not far from Balanea, witness Ptolomy: and therefore Plineus calleth it Valania, and Po-fellus, Velania; which River boundeth Phenicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principal River of Affer, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christiana Chrot out of the mouth and papers of Peter Laicfan (which Laicfan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the main River Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the streams which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the city adjoining of the same name: for Elenherus it cannot be. There is also another River described by Adrichome, named Jephthael, which I find in no other Author, and for which he citeth Jos. 19. but the word Gbe, which is added there to Jephthael, is not taken River: but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Geneva, and Arias Montanus turn it. There is also found in Affer the River of Belus, remembered by Josephus and Tactius, which is also called Pagidas, faith Pliny: out of the lands of this River are made the best Glais, which sometimes the Zidonians practised: and now the Venitians at Murana, Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedunim, which it cannot be: for Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Cenderiva, as all Cosmographers, both Ancient and Modern, and the later Travellers into those parts witness. It is true that the River of Chifon taketh water from Chedunim, but not Jos. 13. 3. in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Prolemais Acon, according to Montanus but farther to the South between Caphas and Sycaminum, witness Zeigler, Adrichome, and Schroet.

Besides these Rivers there are divers famous Springs and Fountains, as that of living waters adjoining to Tyre: and Maferophot, where, or after S. Hierome, Maferophotmains, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adjoining (they say) the Inhabitants by seeking for which the water make salt thereof, as at Naimitch. The Mountains which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Calofyria: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phenicia and Syria, extend themselves far into the Land Eastward, 400. stadia, or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giveth to the Valley of Calofyria, which those Mountains inclose: but Pliny gives them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Therapophon, or Dei facies, near Tripolis) to the Mountains of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Tracontis and Bafan, from the Desert Arabia, are called Hermon: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phenicians, Syrians, and the Amorites, Sanir: neither is this any one Mountain apart, but a continuation of Hills: now as which running farther Southerly, is in the second Scriptures called Galaad, or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet this

Hieremy

Hieremy proveth: Galaad in miki caput Libani: noting, that this Galaad is the highest of those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knows them by the name of Tracoonite: and Ptolomy by Hippus. Arinus Montanus calleth these Mountains bordering Affer: Libanus, for Anti-Libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giveth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because (according to Tacitus) the highest of them are covered with snow all the Summer: the Hebrew word Libanos, (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whiteness. Others call them by that name of the Franks, because those Trees yield: because Libanus is also the Greek word for that Gum.

Niger out of Aphrodisius affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kind of honey dew, which is by the Sun congealed into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word Saccharum.

The Rivers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorroas, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons bororum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountains of Affer, are those Hills above Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountain of Abarim in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threecore miles distant.

§. IV.

THE TRIBE OF NEPH TALIM.

§. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

The next portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Affer, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the son of Jacob by Billa, the hand-maid of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to bear arms, numbered at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their sons, 45400. besides Infants, Women, and Children, under twenty years of age. The Land of Nephtalim took beginning on the North part, from the Fountains of Jordan, and the Hill of Libanus adjoining, as far South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Affer, and on the East and South-East by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adjoining to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit, in which Tract, and under Libanus, was the city of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountains adjoining shadowed from the Sun the better part of the day. Postellus call it Balbec; Niger, Misrbech; and Leonclavius, Realbecca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldean Paraphrase; otherwife Bethsemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis: The City of the Sun: into which, saith Ulpian, Severus the Roman Emperour sent a Colony: the other Geselius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a city in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adjoining to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis of whom the region towards Palmyna hath the name of Chalcidice, over which Herod Agrippa, and Bernice the Queen commanded.

Abila also gave name to the region adjoining, of which Lysanias the son of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governor: whereof Ptolomy gave it the addition of Lysanias, and called it Abila Lysani. Volaterran nameth it Apbila, of which he notes, that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister was native, who by Volaterran is intitled Apuleius, not Abileus. After that this city of Abila or Apbila had received the Christian Faith, Priscillianus became the Bishop thereof: slain afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Trever.

For distinction of this city (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered, that in the Tribe of a Manasse it is joined upon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another city of the same name, saving that it is written with an (B) for an (D) and called Abela, remembered in the 20. chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Josephus calls Abelmachez, and Hierome, Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel, for distinction on sake, it is written Abel Beth-Mabach, (for belike it was the Town of Mabach the wife of Macir, the son of Manasse, the father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This city Joab besieged, because Saba the son of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thence to succour: but a certain wife woman of the city persuading the people to cast Saba his head over the wall, Joab retired his Army. The same city was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalesar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plain ground; and therefore no marvel that many Towns, with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for even of bewailing, many places took name; as Bochim, Judg. 2. 4. and so doubtless Abel-Misram, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Junius in his notes upon Nam. 33. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plain ground there, (to wit in the Land of Moab) and so perhaps Abel-Mekolab in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Town of Elisha the Prophet: also Abel-Tinnor of the Ammonites, whither Jephtha pursued them.

§. II.

Of Hazor.

IN the Tribe of Nephtalim was that famous City of Jabin, in Joshua's time called Azor, (or after the Chaldean Paraphrase, Hazor) by Josephus, Azora; by Junius, Chazor: which Latins names Hefson; the Regal City, and Metropolis of Canaan: seated in the West part of Nephtalim, towards Affer. In this place it was that great Rendevow and Assembly of those four and twenty Kings against Joshua: who being all overthrown, slain, and scattered, this their powerful city was by Joshua taken and burnt to dust. But in process of time the same being re-built by the Canaanites, a second King Jabin, 137. years after the death of this first Jabin, invaded the Israelites: and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatry, he prevailed against them and held them in a miserable servitude 20. years; till Deborah the Prophetess overthrew Sisera, Jabins Lievtenant, and his Army, near the Mountain Tabor. This city Solon restored at such time as he also re-edified Gexar, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with Megiddo, Bethoron, and other cities; but about 260. years after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalesar, King of the Assyrians. It is now, saith Adricomus, called Antipolia: it was one of the principal cities of Decapolis. There is another city of this name in the Territory of Benjamin, seated on the confines of Affalon, called the new Hazor, saith Hieronymus.

§. III.

Of Cesarea Philippi.

There was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim; that renowned city of Lais, or Lajisch, as Junius writes it, or Leschen; which city the children of Dan (being straitened in their Territory under Juda) invaded and mastered; and gave it the name of their own Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Genes. 14. at which place Abraham surprised Chedorloamer and his confederates, and followed his victory as far as Sobab, formerly remembered in the division of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the joyned name of Leschem-Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneva, Lajsch, Josephus, Dana, Benjamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witness Neubrigensis, Tyrinus, Volaterranus, Brocard the Monk, and Postellus: who also taketh this city to be the same, which in Matth. 15. 39. in the Pulgar is called Magadan, for which the Greek Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Marks, speaking of the same story, Dalmannitha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free city, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subject unto the Kings thereof; or else written Judg. 18. And there was none to help, because Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no business with other men: for it was above thirty English miles from the Mediterranean Sea, and from Zidon.

In after-times when these regions became subject to the state of Rome, it had the name of Panacas, from a Fountain adjoining to called: and therefore Ptolomy calls it Cesarea Panica. Hegesippus calls it Parnium, saith Weissenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy; for in Hegesippus, set out by Badius, it is written Pannum without an (R): and at such time as Philip the son of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governor of Tracoonitis, sometime Cesarea: this city was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tiberius Caesar, he called it Cesarea Philippi: and so it became the Metropolis, and head city of Tracoonitis, and one of the six cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned; by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in S. Hieronims time the Citizens remembered their former Panacas, and so re-called it, with the Territory adjoining by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloody issue; by touching the hem of his garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, either Hamath or Emath being far removed, and beyond the fore-named Mountains, which inclose all those Lands which Israel ever had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Hurea, witnesses στέλλα and Laufjan; and not that in Neptulim, where Jonathas Blacchabars attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night,

Of Antioch the Cesarea (or Cesarea) called Cesarea Philippi: see the former part of Manasse. Of Dionysius see Sophoris in Zabulon. Rafsch, haz. Enclit. l. 7. c. 14. Josephus l. 6. c. 254.

For though Tracónitis be comprehended within Iuraea (and therefore it is said to be psittima Gadites Gentium) yet it hath beginning over the Mountains Tracónis, and so it stretcheth into the Plains of the Territory of Iuraea; whence Philip the brother of Herod was tetrarch, or President, both of Iuraea and Tracónitis: both which are over Jordan towards the East. But Cemah in Nephthim, is on the West side of Jordan towards the Mediterranean Sea.

The Country Iuræ was so called of Jetur, one of the sons of Ismael; it is placed in the bounds of Cæloſyria, and *Arabia the Defart.

The people Ituræi were valiant and war-like men, and excellent Archers: Of whom Virgil:

Iluræos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Eugh the Itureans bows were made.

This City Chamath, or Hamath in Neptalim, seems to have been as ancient as the other in Turea, both built by Amathus the eleventh son of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Tobu for King, it is not certain; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountains, and Hammath in Neptalim, were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose fibugation Tobu rejoiced, because Huadadefer, whom the Damascians came to help, was his enemy. This Tobu fearing the strength and prosperity of David, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessels of gold, silver, and brass.

But it seems that David in such great success would not have had peace with Tobiah, if he had been King of any place in Nephtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tyoba : which City Solomon after his Fathers death made himself Master of, as a part of the lands (a in the larger and conditional promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hammath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after divers mutations and changes, both of name and fortune, being, as it hath been said, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While S. Hierome lived, it remained a City well peopled, known to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greeks by Epiphania.

6. VI.

Of Reblatha & Rama, and divers other Towns.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath, towards Jordan, standeth the fountain Daphni, or Ribla, watered from the fountain Daphni: which falleth into the Lake of Meroz. Hereunto was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Jericho: & delivered to Nebuchodonosor: who to be avenged of Zedekias's infidelity, beyond the proportion of piety, first caused the Princes his children to be slain in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that ever he should behold in this world, and so the most remembered, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: & binding him in iron chains, he waded a slave to Babylon, in which state he ended his life. Of which seldom exampled calamity, though not in express words, Jeremy the Prophet foretold him in Hierusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly speaking in the person of God: I will bring him to Babel, to the Land of the Chaldeans, yet shall he not see it: though he shall die there.

There are, besides these before remembered, many other strong Cities in Nephthim, as that which is called (a) Cedes; there are two other of the same name, one in (b) Isjacbar, another in Juda, of which Jof. 15:23.
and therefore to distinguish it, it is known by the addition of (c) Nephthim, as Jud. 4.
It is leared on a high hill, whence Jof. 27.
*Ke-
des* in Galilea in monte Nephthim: Jofeph 12:18. calls it Cedes, and in S. Hieromes time it was called Cidifus. Belfrey greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Defart of Pharan.

After the King thereof, among other of the Canaanites, perished by the hand of Jehoi, ^{Chap. 8.} was made a City of refuge, and given to the Levites. Herein was Barac born, who over- ^{19.}threw the Army of the second Jabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime past by Togathpahalor, when he walked Nephthim: afterward by the Romans, and numbered for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolis Region: When it had imbraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishop's seat, but in time it fell with the rest into the

the power of the Saracens and Turks, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some four Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sebeth, otherwise Zepher, which was also one of the ten De-capolitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many years the inexpugnable Fortress of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritima, near it. Touching Rama of Nephthim, seated Northward near Sebeth, this is to be noted, that there are divers places of this name in Palestine, all accrued on hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebreis excellens 3 Ramah with the Hebrews is high). Also that from this Rama, Jof 19, 26. they read Avana, making the Article (which it hath in the Hebrews, as being a name of divers Towns) to be a part of the word, whence calling away the aspiration, they read Arena. From Sebeth towards the West they place Bethjemes, of which Jof 19, 28 which defended it self against Nephthim, Jud. 1, 33. paid them tribute. On the other side of Sebeth, towards the East, was Beshanath, who also kept their Cite from the Nephthims.

Adjoining to which standeth Carthana, (dor) Kiriathbajim, a City of the Levites, not far from the Mountain out of which the springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mon- tebristi, a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choice of twelve, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles of Mellengers: of which place, or the acts there in done, there is often mention in the (e) E- vangelists.

Adjoining to these are Magdalah, a place of Gilead, (f) and Meloth, of which we read, that it was forced by Baebdi in the time of the (g) Machabees; also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Beratha's of Nephthalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, (h) one near Chamath in the North border, of which Essek. 47.6. another (upon a weak conjecture out of Joseph. ant. 1.5. c.2.) he therefore placeth in this tract near the waters of Meron; because the Kings that joyned with Jabin against Tophan, which incamped at the waters of Meron, Josh. 11. 5. are by Josephus said to have encamped at the City Beratha in Galilee, not far from Cadesa superior, which is also in Galilee: to which may be true of that Beratha of which Essek. feeling it is in that Galilee which is called Denez not but that there was another Kirjathaim in Reuben, Josh. 18. 25. & Mark 3. Nath. 10. Abi. Nat. 19. Josh. 18. 25. Me. 9. 30. & Gen. 36. 40. & 1 Sam. 17. 28. & 1 Sam. 30. 31. & 1 Sam. 31. 1. & 1 Sam. 31. 1. & 1 Sam. 31. 1.

led the upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim near Abela (of which Abela, or Abel-Beth Nabaab, we have spoken already) this he doth upon a conjecture touching the place, 2 Sam 20 14. where some read Abel & Bethnabaab, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Beres: for Sheebah being of Benjamin (in which Tribe also there is a City called Berotha, or Beeroth) drew the men of that City after him.

To the North of Brotha of Nephthim standeth Sebarim under Lihana, cembred by Ezek. 47. and Argeth gectum, near the waters of Ateron, or Samuchoniti, the City of Sifara, Lieutenant of the Army of the second Jabin: from whence not far off, towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrchi, a strong City: besides many others, whereof I had not particular story of importance: as Ser in Job. 19. v. 35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Affidim and Ser. Then Adama, which they call Edama: also Hion, which they call Abion, of which in the books of Kings. Then the strong City of Cinnereth, after called Gennezareth, whence we read of the Land and Lake of Gennesa.

we read of the Lilno and Likno for Orbachazar, the same Lake which is also called the Sca of Therius In the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border: of which * 1 Mac. 9.2. also divers others, named Jof, 19. as Onca, or Chuhkek Horem and Azanob-labor (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Jofia, Jerzon, Lakkun, Jepnack, Helec, and Kacacat; for which two last they place near Caforsa Philippi: To these they add out of Jofnu, Nekeb, and Adami: for which two Junius readeth Fitch Adami, making it not Town, but Ditch called by some of Ademeth, as it seems; or at least the custody of which March or Limit belonging to the Town. To these out of Sam. 33. 1. they add Seplana, which 1 Num. 32. 1. seems to be called Siphath. As Jofus they fetch out and Helon, wherefore the former they treat out of Ezek. 47. 16. and the latter out of Jof. 19. 32. it may appear by Junius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former he readeth Mediana, being a place and for the latter Overturn. The City of of, and of the later Septuaginta. The City of the other by transposition of the letters of the word, and the addition of which Kethiv we have noted already, that is also Kith thajim. In the place, Seg. 4, is introduced, that being it, that there was a City called Nephthim, as is testified by the following verses: the Tribe of Nephthim is meant, and not the City of that name.

M m 2

THE TRIBE OF ZABULON.

OF Zabulon, or Zebulun, another of the Tribes of Israel; there were numbered at Mount Sinai, 54,000 able men, besides women, children, and aged unable persons: all which dying in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their illues 65000. fit to bear arms: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Affer to the River Chifon Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Affer are Stacanimum on the Sea thores; of which Joseph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debbafet, of which Jof. 19. 11. Jekonam, or Jockneham (whose King was (a) lain by Jofia, and the City was given to the Levites;) and Gaba, after called the City of Horfemen, of a Regiment there garrison'd by Herod. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the city of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent. (b) Burnt to the ground by Cestius, Lieutenant of the Roman Army. Adriacum makes it the birth-City of (c) Elon Judge of Israel, because he is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Ajalon.

To the East of this City of Zabulon is Cateth, of which Jof. 19. 15. on the border of Affer; and beyond it the lesser (d) Cana of Galilee, where Christ converted water into wine: the native City of Nathaniel, and as it is thought of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountains of Zabulon: and then the City of Cethron (in Zeigler, Chiltron) which defended it self against Zabulon. Then Bersibe, which standeth in the partition of the upper and nether Galilee, fortified by Josephus against the Romans. Not far from hence standeth Shimron of Aleron, whose King was slain by Jofia.

Then Damna, or Dimna, a City of the Levites: then Nos, or rather Neba, of which Jof. 19. 13. Then Dothan, or Dothain, where Joseph found his brethru feeding their flocks: the same wherein Eliazar, besieged by the Syrians, struck them all blind.

Beyond it, towards the East, they imagine (e) Amthar, or Amahar: then Rommon of the Levites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is Bethaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilean Sea, and watered by the Springs of Capharnaum, the native City of the Apollites, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles, but these people being no less incredulous than the Capharnaums, and others, received the same Curse of thraidded miseries, as It is unto thee Bethaida, &c.

Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalah, the habitation of Mary Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high-cited City of Josapata, fortified by Josephus in the Roman war: but in the end, after a long siege, surpris'd by Vespasian, who slaughtered many thousand of the Citizens, and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Josephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that Sea, and the Lake of Genenezareth, within Zabulon, was that of Tiberias, from whence, after the Galilean Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the City Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Caesar; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapoli, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew from the Toll or Custom-house, to be an Apostle; and near unto it raised the daughter of Tairus from death: it was built (as Josephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother and nephew of Philip, in the beginning of the reign of Claudian; Caesar, in the most fruitful part of Galilee; but in a ground full of sepulchres: Quam genant in iuxta locum leges (saith he) ad septem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; Whereas by our law he should be seven days held as unclean, who inhabited in such a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Josephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as some have thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephthalim.

Neer unto this Tiberias, at Ennaus, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias. More into the Land toward the South-west is Bethulia, seated on a very high hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Holofernes and Judith, such as it is. Neer which standeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adjoining unto it Capharath, fortified by Josephus against the Romans: and Japha, an exceeding strong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in fury slew 15000. of the Citizens; and carried away Jof. 19. 15. two thousand prisoners.

On the South side are the Cities of Carthi, Chabon, and Gabara, of which Josephus in his own life, then Jofie, according to Adriacum (of which Jof. 19. 12.) for he thinks Chabon is that it is not that Japha of which we spake before, but now out of Josephus, Jadala, of which Jof. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Jadela: under it called West.

Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishop's seat) and the City Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembered Judith 7. 3. otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Nazareth is the City Saffa, or Saffra, the birth-city of Zebedeus, Alpheus, James and John: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Josephus: Sephorum according to Brochard: which afterward, saith Heggeppus, and Hierome, was called Diocetaria, the city of Joachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary; it was called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Josephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee: in another place he saith, Urbium Galilearum maxima Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Iussaphan ere he went it. Herod Antipas, when he made it the Regal seat of the nether Galilee, and surrounded it with a strong wall, called it Antiochida, which is as much to say as Imperial, saith Josephus; and it is now but a Castle called Zahit.

To the South-west of this Sephoris, or Diocetaria, was that bleak place of Nazareth, the city of Mary the Mother of Christ; in which he himself was conceived: it standeth between Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this city he abode chiefly four and twenty years, and was therefore called a Nazarene, as the Christians afterward were for many years. It was erected into an Archbishoprick, in the following age. Near unto it are the cities Burra, afterward well defended against the Turks; and Nabalal, of which Jof. 19. 15. and Judg. 1. 30. where it is called Nabaloth and Jof. 21. 35. where it is a city of the Levites; near the Sea, adjoining to the River of Chifon is Sarid, noted in Iofua for the uttermost of Zabulon.

In this Territory of Zabulon there are divers small Mountains: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, James, and John: unto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memory whereof, on the top of the Mountain, the Empress Helen built a sumptuous Chappel.

In the chief River of Zabulon is Chifon, which riseth out of Tabor, runneth with one stream Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another stream Westward where it riseth, and do far as it runneth Southward, is called Chedunim, or Cadunim: and for mine own opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomy calleth horfens: though others distinguish them, and let Chorfen by Cafaria Palestina. There is a second Torrent or Brook that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalah: and the third is a branch of a river rising out of the Fountains of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and near Magdalah; which Torrent they call Doblim, from the name of the city, from which it falleth Eastward to Bethaida, and so joining with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Jephthael, which Jofia reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon: it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

S. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISSACHAR.

The next adjoining Territory to Zabulon, to the South and South-west, was Issachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Exod. 31. as appeared by their multitudes at Mount Sinai, 54,400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land 64300.

The first city of this Tribe near the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English miles, or somewhat more; a city wherein the Jews (by the practice of a certain mutinous upstart, John the son of Levi) took arms against Josephus the Historian, then Governour of both Galilees. This city was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jews carried thence captive; and afterward with great difficulty by Vespasian, who entered it by the Sea side, having first beaten the Jews in a Sea-fight upon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages; saving that his fury being quenched with the Rivers of blood running through every street, he reserved the remainder for slaves and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Ceffion, or Cephion of the Levites, and then Issachar, remembered in the first of Kings, c. 4. v. 17. then Aber, or Ebers, Jof. 19. 20. and Remoth, of which Jof. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 37. or Iarmuth, Jof. 21. 19. this also was a city of the Levites, from whose Territory the Mountains of Gilboa take beginning: and range themselves to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as far as the City of Tezrael, between which and Ramoth, are the cities of Bethpaphes, or Bethpaphes, according to Zeigler, or Adriacum, near which Saul ing to Jofia, and Ennada, or Hen-chadda, near which Saul slew himself: under those, Aphec, or Apbeca, the first he placed it, which Adriacum saith, he placed it between which and Snach, he saith, that the Philistines incamped against Israel, and afterward against Saul: a Land thrifty of blood, for for herein also, faith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli assisting Benhadad, encountered Achab, and were overthrown and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness, boast himself as he that putteth it off; meaning, that glory followed after victory, but ought not to precede it. In the year following in the fields, as they lay, adjoining to this city, was the same vain-glorious Syrian utterly broken and discomfited by Achab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites, or Syrians, slain: before which overthrow the servants and counsellors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountains: and therefore if they fought with them in the Plains, they should overcome them.

Under Aspeh towards the Sea, they set the city of Esarel, in the Plains of Galilee: called also the great field of Esarel, and Ataggeido: in the border whereof are the ruins of Aspeh to be seen, faith Brocard, and Brodenbach. After these are the cities of Cosialoth, of which 1 Mac. 9.2. Anen, or Haganin, of the Levites, and Secima, or Shafama, the West border of Isachar, of which Iof. 19.22. From hence ranging the Sea coast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrims: a strong Castle, invironed with the Sea, sometime the storehouse and Magazine of the Christians, and built by the Earl of Saint Giles, or Tolouse.

From the Castle of Pilgrims, the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthestmost there beginneth Mount Carmel, not far from the River Chifon, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab, and the people assembled, to make trial whether the God of Israel, or the Idol of Baal were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed, and cut their own flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in devotion told them, that their God was either in pursuit of his enemies, not at leisure, or perchance asleep, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah the fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many vessels of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the banks of Chifon adjoining.

At the foot of this Mountain to the North, standeth Carphas, built, as they say, by Carphas the High Priest. It is also known by the name of Perfurat, and Porphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seat. Returning again from the Sea-coast towards Tiberias, by the banks of Chifon, there are found the city of Haphraim, or Aphraim, and the Castles of Mezra and Saba: of which Brocard and Brodenbach: and then Naim on the River Chifon: a beautiful city while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widows only son.

Then Seon or Shion, named Iof. 19. between the two Hills of Hermion, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchantress that undertook to raise up the body of Samuel at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anabarith and Rabbith, named Iof. 19. v. 19.20. Then Dabarath, as it is named, Iof. 21. 28. or Dobrath, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6.71. This city (which stretcheth it self over Chifon) was a city of refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Dabarath is Artelea situate, near the Caves of those two Thieves which to greatly molested Galilee in Herods time. It joyneth on one side to the Mountain of Isachar, or Hermion, and on the other to the Valley of Isachar: which Valley continueth it self from Bethsan, or Scythopolis the East border of Isachar, even to the Mediterranean Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountains of Gilboe on the South, and in Hermion and the River Chifon on the North. In these Plains Gideon overthrew the Midianites, and herein, they think, Saul fought against the Philistines, Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

§. VII.

THE HALF OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

§. I.

Of the bounds of this half Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

The next Tribe which joyneth it self to Isachar towards the South, is the half of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasse was the first begotten of Joseph, the eleventh son of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasse, with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbered amongst the sons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarchs.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Defauts, there entered of their issues,

52700. bearing arms. The Territory which fell on this one half of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the East, and Dora upon the Mediterranean Sea on the West, Isachar on the North, and Manabata is the South border.

The first and principal City which stood in this Territory was Buthsan, sometime Nysa, faith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asia the less, and pierced into the South, to the uttermost of Caesofria, they built this City a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the City of Scythians, given by the Greeks.

These barbarous Northern people constrained the Jews to fight against their own Nation and kindred, by whose hands when they had obtained victory, they themselves set on the Jews which served them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmost towards the South of Caesofria: and Strabo joyns it to Galilee. It is seated between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in anone ad montes acrabitene, faith Zeigler. But I find it in the East part of the Valley of Isachar near Jordan: after that Jordan strengtheneth it self again into a River, leaving the Sea, or Lake Genesareth. Notwithstanding Montanus describeth it far to the West, and towards the Mediterranean Sea, near Endor, contrary to Stella, Laifan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This City was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expel the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane, an enemy, or Bethsan, the house of an enemy.

Over the walls of this Bethsan the Philistines hung the body of Saul, and his sons slain at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Dioceses, numbered by Tyrinus, in his 14. Book and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later travellers in those parts affirm, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruins of that City, goodly pillars, and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witness the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and desolate Village.

From Bethsan keeping the way by Jordan, they find an ancient City called Salem, which City the ancient Rabbines, faith Hierome, do not find to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a town of that name, near Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13. 18. do not confirm, where the Vulgar readeth transiitque in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others read venit incolunt ad Civitatem Sichemorum, making the word salem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John 3. 13. where it is said, that John was baptizing in Enon near Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which S. John speaketh, is but contracted of Shabalin, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. 9. 4. This word Junius maketh to be the plural of Shubal: of which we read, 1 Sam 13. 17. for as for that which is added out of Canticles 6. 12. of Shulammitis, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Salem near Enon, it hath no probability.

Not far from thence where they place this Salem, they find Bezeck the City of Adonibezec, Josephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Juda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieve Jebesh Gilead, against Nabab the Ammonite: who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Near Bezeck is the City of Bethbara, or rather Beth-bar, of which Judg. 7.24. in the story of Gideon: and then Ephra, or Hephra, wherein Gideon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which he pulled down and defaced; and near it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers; a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turks to this day: and not far hence, between the Village of Alophon and Jordan, Ptolomus Lathurus overthrew Alexander Iof. 1. 13. c. 2. 1. and

King of the Jews, and slaughtered, as Josephus numbereth them, 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Prologus pass by the Villages of the Jews, he slew all their women, and caud the young children to be sold in great Caldrons, that the rest of the Jews might thereby think that the Egyptians were grown to be men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terror.

Towards the West and on the border of Manasse, they place the Cities of Amor of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, 1 Chr. 6. 20 Judg. 7.22. placeth in Ephraim: it was the habitation of Heli the Prophet, numbered among those places, 1 Reg. 4. 12. which were given in charge to Baana by Solomon, to which Iof. 21. 25. whose charge also Tahanac belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Josiah, though their King was afterward hanged, and their City given to the Levites. In the body of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat nearer Jordan than to the Adonibezec Iof. 11. 17 ditturan

Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Jerusalem, whole King was one of those that Josiah slew: which the Kings of Judah used for their Regal seat, till such time as Samarina was built. From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Ashta to enquire of her sons health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sons death.

The second was Sheber near Samarina, of which name there are both in Egypt and Greece, of great fame: in the assault of the Tower of this Town, wherinto the Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelec was wounded by a weighty stone, thrown by a woman over the wall, who despairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to lay him out-right, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a woman. But others sit this City in Ephraim near Sichem, or Neapolis.

The third is Arabat, of which the Territory adjoining is called Arabatena, (one of the ten Tetrarchies or governments in Judea) for which Hierome, 1 Mac. 5. reads Arabatena: but in the Greek it is Arabatene: Isidore calls it Arabat. This City had one of the largest Territories of all Palestine belonging to the Governor thereof. Josephus remembereth it often, as in his second book of the Jews wars, c. 11. 25, 28. and elsewhere.

The difference between a Tetrarchy and a Tophary, was, that the first was taken for a Province, and the other for a City with some lesser Territory adjoining; and a Tetrarch is the same with Prætor in Latine, and Præfident in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdom; and thereof so called. Pliny nameth seventeen Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and so hath the Kingdom of Ireland to this day, Leinster, Ulster, Connaught, and Munster.

To the South-west of Arabat they place the Cities of Balaam, or Elbam, and Cethremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of Jos. 21. 25. and 1 Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one; and that Jehoram, Jos. 16. 11. is another name of the same City.

Then is Jezael a Regal City, set at the foot of the Mountains of Gilboa, towards the South-west: herein Jezabel, by a false accusation, caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end she might possess his Vineyard adjoining to the City, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his father.

Joram also was cast unburied into the same field: for which his mother Jezabel murdered Naboth.

Toward the Sea from Jezael is the City which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Abaziah King of Juda fled from Jehoi, when he had slain Joram, he was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Mageddo adjoining. The Scripture calls this City of Gaber, Gur.

Then Adadremmon, near unto which the good King Josiah was slain by Necho King of Egypt, in a war unadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Affria against the King thereof, by the commandment of God; whom Josiah thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximinopolis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Mageddo, often remembered in the Scriptures, whose King was slain among the rest by Josiah: yet they defended their City for a long time against Manasse. The River which passeth by the Town, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomy calleth Chorfenus; and not that of which we have spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that have described the Holy Land, delineate no such River. Moore only sets it down in his Geography of the twelve Tribes: but the River which passeth by Mageddo, he undertandeth to be but a branch falling thence into Leisfan and Schret make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the waters of Mageddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent so called.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia even to Sebastie, or Samaria; and so far beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Jos. 15. calls Cæsaria Palestina, a City of Phœnicia; yea, Laurentius Coronius extendeth Phœnicia as far as Gaza: seeing also Ptolomy sets down Chorfenus for the partition of Phœnicia and Judea, this river running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Mageddo, after the name of the City which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomy in his fourth Table of Asia, calleth Chorfenus. The later travellers of the Holy Land call Mageddo Subimbre at this day.

II.

Of Cæsaria Palestina, and some other Towns.

FROM Mageddo toward the West, and near the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious City of Cæsaria Palestina: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Pliny calls Apollonia: though Ptolomy sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, between this City and Joppe, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia

Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of set and polished marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might look over the Seas far away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: he forced a Harborow of great capacity, being in former times but an open bay: and the wind blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables and Anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdom, nor in any age; which, because the Materials were fetched from far, and the weight of the stones was such, as it exceeded belief, I have added Josephus own words of this work, which are these: Hanc locorum *in commoditate constructus, cerulorum portuum circumdedit, quantum putaret magna classi recipienda sufficere: & in viginti ulnarum profundum, prægrandia saxa demisti: quorum pleraque pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero quoddecim, altitudine novempedali: fuerunt quadam etiam majora, mino-ra alia: To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Josephus) he compassed in a Bay wherein a great Fleet might well ride: and let down great stones twenty fadome deep: whereof some were fifty foot long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foot thick: and some bigger, some lesser.

To this he added an arm or cawle of two hundred foot long, to break the waves: the rest he strengthened with a stone wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Druſus, after the name of Druſus the son in law of Cæsar: in whose honour he intituled the City itself, Cæsaria of Palestine: all which he performed in twelve years time. It was the first of the Eastern Cities that received a Bishop:
afterward erected into an Archbishoprick, commanding twenty others under it, saith*

Josephus.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzornus, and Galafus, to have been Bishops thereof. In this City was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle. S. Paul was herein two years prisoner, under the Præfident Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeal, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a god by his flatterers, he was stricken with an Angel unto death, saith Josephus.

To the North of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some read, Jos. 1. 2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it lay joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slain by Josiah. But Junius, for in Naphoth Dor, reads in tradibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Naphoth Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Josiah call it Nephth-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nephth-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Jos. 12. 23. Judg. 1. 27.) may seem to be Dor. It was a strong and powerful City, and the fourth in account of those twelve Principalities, or Sitarchies, which Solomon erected. Junius upon Attec. 15. 11. placeth this between the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the river Chorfenus: for so some name the river Chorfenus, of which we have spoken already.

Into this City, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. horse: the same perfidious villain that received 200. talents for the ransom of Jonathan Machabæus (whom he had taken by treachery) and then slew him: and after him slew his own Master, usurping for a while the Kingdom of Syria. It had also a Bishops seat of the Diocesis of Cæsaria.

From Cæsaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Caphernaum, Gabe, and Galgai: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Evangelists, they find in these parts near the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe, Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgai, or Gilgai, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgai, they say, it was whole King was slain by Josiah.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Machabees, it was called Capharsalama: in the fields whereof Judas Machabæus overthrew a part of the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an Army drawn into Judea by a traitorous Jew called Aleimus who contended for the Priest-hood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was Saint Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem, conducted by 470. fouldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In after-times the Army of Godfrey of Bullion attempted it in vain: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those days with a Bishops seat, but it is now a poor Village, called Affor, saith Brocard. Near unto this City the Prophet Jonas was three days preserved in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, N n

ria, standeth Nabata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Roman was taken with fire and sword, because the Jews which dwelt at Cesaria fled thence, and carried with them the Books of Moses. Never unto it is the Mountain of Adia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein he had a hundred Prophets, and fed them: after which he himself is said to have obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecy also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdom of Phœnicia.

S. I.

The bounds and chief Cities, and Founders, and Name of this Kingdom: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BECAUSE these five Tribes, of Asher, Nephthalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the half of Manasse, possess the better part of that ancient Kingdom of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus; I have therefore gathered a brief of those Kings which have governed therein: at least for many of them as time (which devourer all things) hath left to posterity: and that the rest perished, it is not strange: seeing so many Volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates, and Conquest of Heathen Princes have been torn, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertain: but all Geographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Cassotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthofia, to the North of Tripolis. Pliny makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Eleutherus: that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthofia, and stretching from thence along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, as far as the River of Chorofus: which seems to be that which the Jews call the Torrent, or River of Maggeddo. Pliny extends it further, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budeus, Joppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud græcos appellata (saith Budeus) que nunc Palestina Syrie dicitur; Ita nunc Palestina of old (saith he) which now is called Palestina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Country of Phœnicia all the Sea-side of Judæa, and Palestina, even unto Palestium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Cælofrya, which he boundeth not. But for my self, I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldom deceived in his own art. It had in it these famous Maritime Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orthofia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Cesaria Palestina: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-towns, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Eastern world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterranean Sea.

The ancient Regal Seat of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first son of Canaan: and the people then subject to that people were called Zidonians; the same state continuing even unto Joshua's time. For still then, it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Book of Vandalic wars. But in process of time the City of Tyre adjoining, became the more magnificent: yet, according to the Prophet, it was but a daughter of Zidon, and by them first built, and peopled.

But after the death of Moses, and while Joshua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Ishber, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cædemon and Arinus) and built and possessed the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second son) the use of Letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his sister Europe, taught the Greeks. For Taurus King of Crete, who when he surprised Tyre, had stolen her thence: of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiter's transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinius makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia; and finds Cadmus his Successor, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the father of Agenor, or not Neptune: because the successours of Dido held that name always in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Aldrubal, Hannibal: whose memory Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

The Queen anon commands the weighty bowl

(Weighty with precious stones and massie gold)

To flow with wine. This Belus us'd of old, And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were father or grandfather to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the son of Neptune by Lybia the daughter of Epaphus, or were he the son of Thelephus, according to Enfibi; yet it is agreed that Cecrop then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith Saint Augustine, Moses left Egypt: Agenor's successour living at once with Joshua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny, but that he gave that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his son. But instead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where he learnt the use of Letters (Egypt flourished in all kind of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to save his own Territory; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great loss and dishonour of that Nation: and by Joshua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and possess the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the loss which they received by the hand of God in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues, cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by land: which also they knew had to many powerful Nations to defend it: the Dejarts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Amorites, Ammonites their Borderers: yet Egypt having such Vessels or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use, did not in all probability neglect to garrison the Sea-coast, or assist Agenor with such forces as they had to spare; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Phœnicians, which held the shores of Canaan next adjoining unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the course of the story, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Josiah, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Joshua called the strong City Archo, afterward Ptolomais, Achzi, and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those daies.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appears, first by their defence against Israel: secondly, by this, that David and Solomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it self 13 years against a King of Syria, Nebuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed irresistible) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Josephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrrus the son of Japhet. And for the Region it self, though Cassibenes derive it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greeks from the word Phœnos, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts; yet for my self, I take it that Phœnicia the son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his son in Greece, were the Inventors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Egyptians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and civil Policies, which they afterwards profited, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himself was instructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Divinity and Philokophy: and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received Civility. Again, the Phoenicians challenge this invention of Letters and of Learning; acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his sons were Africans; whence Lucan,

Lucan. 1. Phoenices primi (sane si creditur) anli
3. Mansurum rudibus totum fingere figuris.

Phoenicians first (if fame may credit have)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the son of Agenor, and was a Phenician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; who when he in a kind of reproach was called a Stranger, and not a Phenician.

Lucan. 1. Si patria est Phoenix, quid tum? nam Cadmus Dignus.

Phoenix; cui debet Gracia docta libror.

If a Phenician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The Books of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phenicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Josephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Hebrews again subscribe to none of these reports; but affirm constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them: when Atlas lived in Mauritania; Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt; and Oebus in Phenicia. Yea, some of the French do not blush to maintain, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greeks the use of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as those Gauls; and that they sent their sons hither to be by them instructed in all kind of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this invention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all; for he lived at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most, both in Egypt and Affrica; and he himself was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that Letters were invented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the general Flood: either by Seih or Enos, or by whom else God knows; from whom all wisdom and understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath given the same invention to divers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for even in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Books after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently used by the Egyptians; and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kind of Heraldry; and their Princes differing in Arms and Scutcheons, like unto those used by the Kings and Nobility of other Nations, jura naturalia communia, & generalia &c. Natural laws are common, and general.

§. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

BUT whatsoever remaineth of the Story and Kings of Phenicia (the books of Zeno, Sachoniarbo, Atanasas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochensis.

Agenor lived at once with Jofus, to whom succeeded Phenix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so far towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phenicia: what King succeeded Phenix it doth not appear; but at such time as the Grecians besieged Troy, Phis governed Phenicia.

In Hieremies time, and while Jehojakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremy speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of several Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phenicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as some Writers affirm, Xerxes Fleet; or rather, as I suppose, those 300 Gallies, which himself brought to his aid: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phenicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subjected by Nabuchodonosor 3 of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembered, Hieremy prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembered by D.Siculus in his 14. Book.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependency upon Darius, and that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Grecians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. years and somewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of of restitution, because (saith Curtius) he rather submitted himself by the infliction of his subjects (who foresaw their utter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Athenaus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living, and most voluptuous; also that he appointed certain games and prizes for women-dancers, and singers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and assembled: that having beheld the most beautiful and lively among them, he might recover them for his own use and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were near him with an Army too weighty for his strength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himself, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the Sword out of his hand, and slew him: which done, she also therewith pierced her own body, and died.

After Alexander was possessor of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, he gave the Kingdom to Hephestion to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompense him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen, no less virtuous than rich, desired Hephestion that this honour might be conferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and presented unto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Josue, Abdolominus, and Plutarch, Alymonius: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal Estate, was with his own hands working in his Garden, setting herbs and roots, for his relief and sustenance: though otherwise a wife man, and exceeding just.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterwards changed into Popular or Aristocratical: and by times and turns subjected to the Emperours of the East, there remaineth no further memory of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appear: Josephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith he garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Josephus and Theophilus Antiochensis, there may be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians; but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Alexander Ephesus, do in no sort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abihales is the first King of the Tyrians, that Josephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the same perchance that the son of Sarich mentioneth in his forty and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abihales, Saron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abihales. David (saith Enchiridion out of Enoplenus) constrained this Saron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Isal. 83.

Hiram succeeded Saron, whom Josephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometimes Hieronymus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. He entered into a league with David, and sent him Cedars, with Maons and Carpenters, to perform his buildings in Hierusalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebusites. The same was he that so greatly afflicted Solomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great sums of money, but also he joyined with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Solomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120 talents of gold. Of this Hiram there is not only mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Josephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. Chap. 2. & 2. in Theophilus his third book the 10. in Tatianus his Oration against the Greeks: 1. Chon. 14. and in Sonarus, Tome the first. This Prince seemeth to be very mighty and magnificent, he despised the 20. Towns which Solomon offered him: he detended himself against that victorious King David: and gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Astartoth, the Idol of the Phenicians. Hiram lived 53. years.

Baleasartus, whom Theoph. Antiochensis calleth Basorus, succeeded Hiram King of Tyre and reigned 7 years, according to Josephus.

Abdasartus the eldest son of Baleasartus, governed 9. years, and lived but 20. year, according to Josephus: but after Theophilus he reigned 12. years, and lived 54. who being slain by the four sons of his own Nurfe, the eldest of them held the Kingdom 12. years.

Astartus brother to Abdasartus, recovered the Kingdom from this Usurper, and reigned 12. years.

Astartinus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, 2. Joseph. 54. Theoph. 58. third third brother, followed Astartus, and ruled 9. years, and lived in all 54.

Phelles the fourth son of Balestartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Astartus, and reigned 8. moneths, and lived 50. years.

Itobahus (or Juthobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astartus, who was the chief Priest of the Goddess Astarta, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Uncle Phelles: and reigned 32. years; the same which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Jezebel Achab married.

Badezor, or Bazor, the son of Itobahus, or Ethbaal, brother to Jezebel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. years, and lived in all 45.

Metminus succeeded Badezor and reigned but 9. years, (saith Jezebelus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters, Elisa and Zinna.

Pygmalion reigned after Metminus his Father 40. years, and lived 56. In the seventh year of whose reign, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. years and 8. moneths after the Temple of Solomon: which by our account was 289. years after Troy was taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and Dido must be far out of square. For Pygmalion, covetous of Sichæus his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traitorously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we believe Justin and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be dispoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers tears, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barce in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captains, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts: others from Jedidia, a surname of Solomon.

Elulcus succeeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36. years: the same that overthrew the Fleet of Salmanasser, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which he continued his siege before it on the Land side five years, but in vain.

After Elulcus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himself to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince died, or was slain in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre 13. years together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. years a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, succeeding each other: First by Ecnibalus, then by Chollis, Abarus the Priest, Atittonus, and Gerasius, who held it among them some 7. years, and odd moneths: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one year: after him Aterbalus sent from Babylon, 4. years: after him Irom, sent thence also, 20. years. In the 17. of whose reign Cyrus began to govern Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozrus his conceit, that the Edumeans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdom and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of divers other Nations, there is one Bozrus that hath written a Treatise at large, intituled, De ruinis Gentium. And although the great and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things under heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who only is unchangeable, and the same for ever; yet whereas the said Bozrus, enforcing here-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion; to prove this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to have been Edumeans, descended from Esau, Jacobs brother: first, it can hardly be believed, that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly devout and religious. But to this end, (besides the proof which the Scriptures give of Hirams good affection when Solomon built the Temple) he brings many conjugal arguments; whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Esau received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumeans, he endeavours to shew, partly by weak reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Sirabo, Herodorus, Pliny, and others, witness, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Islands, called

l. 5. c. 7.

Tyrrus.

Tyrrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumeans: as Elib and Elongabar; or under the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose chief City was Madian, so called of Madian the son of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edumites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartus, the Idol of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the Idolatrous customs of the Greeks. That in Teman, a Town of the Edumeans, was an University, wherein, as may appear by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Job, Religion was sincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bozrus, who labouring to prove one Paradox by another, deserves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumeans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumeans at all. In what Religion Esau brought up his children, it is no where found written; but that himself was a profane man, and disapproved by God, the Scriptures in plain terms express. That his Posterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the 25. Chapter of the second Book of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetual enemies to the house of Israel, save only when David and some of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in subjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of David unfriendly behaviour amongst them, when first they were subdued? surely, it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance between Tyrrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with David; even then when Joab slew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edumites were ill intreated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wisdom of Eliphas the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumeans punished, for being such as David in his own days found them. Although indeed the City of Teman whence Eliphas came to reason with Job, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoining to Hur, the country of Job: and to such the City of Bildad the Subite; as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text maketh manifest. For Job is said to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wisdom; all the people of the East; not the Inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is, that Eliphas the son of Esau had a son called Teman: but that fathers were wont in those days to take name of their sons, I no where find. And that the Tyrians also had a son called Tema: of whom it is not unlike, that Teman in the East had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chapter of the Book of Judges, the Asidianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst give battel to the Host of Israel, wherein were 60000. able men, will hardly believe that such a people were descended from one of Esau his grand-children. For how powerful and numberless must the forces of all Edom have been: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had been so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoining could not have held them. But we no where find that Edom had to do with Amalec, or assisted the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it self, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtless was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Signiory of the Red Sea coast, which Bozrus imagines the Edumeans to have held: if the Edumites in after-times held some places, as Elan and Elongabar on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himself saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Atidian stood, Moses must needs have known it: because he had sojourned long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural Arguments, how probable soever, are needles in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Isaia, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozrus himself confesseth, were Canaanites, as appears, Gen. 10. 15. and 19. appointed by God to have been destroyed, and their Lands given to the children of Aber, Jos. 29. because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed seed of Canaan.

NOT

not Ceulins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Elef-ant be God that hath sent King David a wife for: we cannot infer that he was of David's Religion. The Turk hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Idolaters then worshipped Astarte; and drew Solomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the Temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great provision of Corn and Oyl, and the offer of twenty Towns and Villages in Gathlee. And if we rightly consider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points dealt Merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was; and yet is over pestered, being otherwise apt to yield silks: as the Andarine Silks which come from thence, and other good Commodities. For Corn and Oyl, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well spare to Solomon. Also Gold for Land: when in Solomon was the wiser; who having got the Gold first, gave to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrians was ill pleased. But it was a necessary policy which induced Tyrus to hold league with Israel. For David had subdued Moab, Ammen, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: thorow which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carry their Wares on Camels, to their Fleets on the Red Sea, and back again to Tyrus: so that Solomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to pass, could have cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Solomon, as Lord of the Sea-towns which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, and perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather niggard, as a man of peace, to employ his Fathers Treasure in magnificent Works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria.
Therefore he willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly Buildings, Imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Solomon and Hiram, are no strong arguments of piety in the Tyrians: so those other proofs which Bozins frames negatively upon particular examples are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no man knows.
It seems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchased divine honours; which his Daughters, Nephews, and others of his house obtained; but his own many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples: Every salvage Nation hath some wisdom excellently the Vulgar, even of civil people. Neither did the moral wisdom of these men express any true knowledge of the true God. Onely they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught Idolatry; therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I think, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Solomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozins, who would have us think them to have been formerly a strange kind of devout Edomites.
In which fancy he is so peremptory, that he sileth men of contrary opinion, Impius politicus, as if it were impiety to think, that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not known his Name, doth favour Ver-tue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded moral honesty, with temporal happiness.
Doubtless, this doctrine of Bozins would better have agreed with Julian the Apostate, than with Cyril. For if the Affrians, Greeks, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew nearest unto the true Religion: what may be said of the foul Idolatry which grew in Rome as fast as Rome it self grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory? How few great battles did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new god, or some new honour to one of their old gods? yea, what one Nation, save only that of the Jews, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertain in their City? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman Majesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion which Heathen Writers used against the Christians in the Primitive Church?
That such Idolatry had caused the City of Rome

Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperity were a sign or effect of true Religion. Such is the blind zeal of Bozins, who writing against those whom he fallily rems impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But such infidelity is usually found among men of his humour; who having once either foolishly embraced the dreams of others, or vainly fashioned in their own brains any strange Chimeras of Divinity, condemn all such in the pride of their zeal, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pity it is, that such mad dogs are oftentimes encouraged by those, who having the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious virtue of an Hypocrite.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

HAVING now past over Phanicia, we come to the next Territory adjoining, which is that of Ephraim: sometimes taken per excellentiam, for the whole Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second son of Joseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000, all which dying in the Deserts, (Joseph excepted) there entered the Holy Land of their children grown to be able men, 32500. who sate down on the West side of Jordan; between Manasse and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chief City which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Israel, built by Auris or Honri King thereof, and seated on the top of the Mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, and as far as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cesar. This City is often remembered in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Erochard observeth, the ruins which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewn and carved stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sons of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater:
who to flatter Cesar called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Helias and Abdias buried: and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monks.

Near Samaria towards the South, is the hill of Bethel, and a Town of that name: on the top of which mountain Jeroboam erected one of his golden calves, to be worshipped:
with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountain of Bethel, was Sichar, Job, that ancient City of Sichem; after the restauration called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Napo-lusa: It was destroyed by Simon and Levi, Gen. 34.
in revenge of the ravishment of their sister Dinah; and after that by Abimelec evened with the soil. Jeroboam raised it up again: and the Damascens a third time cast it down.

Under Sichem toward the Sea standeth Tubias, 12. 15
Pharaton or Pirhabon, on the Mountain Amalce, the City of Abdon Judge of Israel.
And under it Bethoron of the Levites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim.
Near to this City Judas Macchabaeus overthrew Seron and Lysias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This City had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Between Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Job. 10. and Saron, whose King was slain by Joshua: it is also mentioned Act. 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh

of them as you have in these words. During which time, he went to Thersa, he encountered the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that he was by God destined to be King of Israel: and to command ten of the twelve tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Solomon's knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Opocheres, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the Edumean, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captain Joab: which Adad the King of Egypt married to his Wives sister Taphnes; using both him and Jeroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdom of Judah: that himself might the easier spoil it, as he did: for in the fifth year of Rehoboam, Shishak sackt the City of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Solomon, and all the spoils which David took from Achish of Gaza, with the presents of Tobai, King of Hamath, which were of an incalculable value.

This Jeroboam after the death of Solomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to govern the Israelites, and from a mean man exalted to that State: yet preferring the policies of the world before the service and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes under his rule should repair to Hierusalem to do their usual Sacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apir, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aaron's Calf in Horeb:) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and unlearned people. This King made his chief Seat and Palace at Sichem: He despised the warning of the Isaiah Prophet, whom Josaphat calleth Idon, and Gheas Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was again restored: but continuing in his Idolatry and hardening, upon occasion that the Prophet returning, was slain by a Lion; Ahijah makes him know that God purposed to root out his posterity.

He was afterward overthrown by Abiah, King of Judah, and died after he had governed two and twenty years; whom Nadab, his son succeeded: who in the second year of his reign, together with all the race of Jeroboam, was slain, and rooted out by Basia, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab lived King but two years.

Basia the son of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made war with Asa King of Juda: he feared himself in Thersa: and for this Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Nephtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Asa carried away the materials, with which Basia intended to fortify Rama: but being an Idolater, he was threatened by Jesus the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Jeroboam: which afterward came to pass: He ruled four and twenty years, and died.

To Basia succeeded Ela his son, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slain by Zambri, after he had reigned two years: and in him the prophetic of Jesus was fulfilled.

Zambri succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seven daies; but Ambris in revenge of the Kings murder, set upon Zambri, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thersa, and inforced him to burn himself.

Ambris or Houri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regal seat from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Sheuer, a bull, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater no less impious than the rest: and therefore subjected to Tabeenmon King of Syria, the father of Benhadad, according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I do not well conceive; seeing Benhadad the son of Tabeenmon was invited by Asa King of Juda, to assail Basia King of Israel, the father of Ela, who forewent Ambris. This Ambris reigned twelve years, six in Thersa, and six in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captivity of the ten Tribes.

Achab, or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not only upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Jezebel the Zidonian: and as Jeroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezebel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the trial of the sacrifice, and killed the false Prophets: and afterward fled for fear of Jezebel.

Benhadad not long after besieged Samaria: & taken by Achab, was by him set at liberty: for which the Prophet (whom Gheas calleth Atichas)

Atichas) reproveth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then pynning with Josaphat in the war for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slain, as Atichas had foretold him.

He had three sons named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Jos: besides many other sons by sundry wives and concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himself by a fall: and sent for counsel to Beelzebub the god of Achabon. Eliab the Prophet meeteth the Messenger on the way: and milking that Ochozias sought help from that dead Idolatrous Messenger, if there were not a God in Israel: Ochozias sendeth two Captains, and with each 50. soldiers, to bring Eliab unto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire.

The third Captain besought mercy at Eliab's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, avowing it to the King that he was then die; which came to pass in the second year of his reign.

Joram, the brother of Ochozias by Jezebel, succeeded: He allured Josaphat King of Juda, and the King of Edom to assail him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 2000. sheep. The three Kings wanted water for themselves and their horses in the Deserts. The Prophet Elija causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are overthrown: their King flieth to Kirbatesh, and being besieged, according to some Expolitors, burnt his son on the walls as a sacrifice, whereat the three Kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seems with better reason, understand the Text to speak of the son of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab shewed him over the walls, threatening, unless the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his gods. Whereupon the King of Edom besought those of Juda and Israel to break off the siege for the safety of his son: which when the other Kings refused to yield unto, and that Moab, according to his former threatening, had burnt the King of Edom's son upon the Rampire, that all the Assailants might discern it, the King of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsook the party of the other Kings, for want of whole assistance the siege was broken up.

After this the King of Aram sent to Joram, to heal Naaman the Captain of his Army, by a false accusation to be stoned. Then pynning with Josaphat in the war for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slain, as Atichas had foretold him.

my of the Leprosie. The answer of Joram was, Am I God to kill, and to give life. But he doth send to heal a man of his Leprosie: adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrel against him. Elija hearing thereof, willed the King to send Naaman to him; promising that he should know that there was a Prophet in Israel: and so Naaman was healed by washing himself seven times in Jordan. Elija refused the gifts of Naaman; but his servant Gebazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spiritual gifts are called Gebazites, as the buyers are Simoni, of Simon Magus.

Afterward Benhadad King of Aram, or Damascus, having heard that this Prophet did discover to the King of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secretest counsel: sent a troop of horse to take Elija: all whom Elija struck blind, and brought them captives into Samaria: Joram then asked leave of the Prophet to lay them, Elija forbade him to harm them: but caused them to be fed, and sent back to their own Prince in safety.

The King of Aram, notwithstanding these benefits, did again attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extremum famine. Joram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elija. Elija by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and Armour to sound in the air, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the Kingdom of Syria by the death of his Master, Joram entering upon his frontier, took Ramoth-Gilead: in which war he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezebel to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Jehu (who commanding the Army of Joram in Gilead, was anointed King by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elija) surprised and slew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posterity of Ahab.

Jehu, who reigned after Jezebel's death, did not only the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he received a promise from God, that his seed should occupy the Throne upon the fourth generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous war, wherein he was beaten by Azael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which war he was slain, saith Codrenus; whereof the Scriptures are silent. Jehu reigned 28. years.

Joachaz, or Joachaz the son of Jehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad

Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subjected, leaving him only 50. horse, 20. char-iots, and 1000. foot: and, as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Joachaz reigned 17. years.

After Joachaz, Joth his son governed Israel, who when he repaired to Elifha the Prophet as he lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories over the Ara-mites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bow, and Elifha covered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window Westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his arrows, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that he should have smitten five or six times, and then he should have had so many victories over the Aramites as he gave strokes. And so it succeeded with Joth, who overthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territory from Benhadad the son of Aziel, which his father Joachaz had lost. He also overthrew Amazia King of Juda, who provoked him to make the war, whereupon he entred Hierasalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Joth reigned sixteen years, and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elifha exchanged this life for a better.

Jeroboam the third son of Jehu, followed Joth his father, an Idolater, as his predecessors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is near Libanus to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty years.

Zacharias the fifth and last of the house of Jehu, slain by Shallum his vassal, who reigned in his stead, governed six months, Shallum held the Kingdom but one month, being slaughtered by Menabem of the Ga-dites.

Menabem, who took revenge of Shallum, used great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with child. This Menabem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of silver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from every man of wealth in Israel. Menabem govern'd twenty years.

Pekahiah, or Phaccia, or after Zonaris, Phaccia succeeded, and after he had ruled two years, he was slain by Phaca, or Pekab the Commander of his Army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekab's time, Phul after, or Tiglat-Pileaser invaded the Kingdom of Israel, and won Jion, Abel-Beit-maacab, Janoach, Kedesh, Hazor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captives into Affria: he was drawn in by Achaz King of Judea, against Pekab and Kazin, the last of the Adader. For Achaz being waited by Pekab of Israel, and by Kazin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church-riches, and therewith engaged the Affrian, who first suppressed that Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inviting of the great Affrian, was the utter ruine of both States, of Israel, and of Judea. Pekab reigned 20. years.

Then Hofhea, or Osea, who slew Pekab, became the vassal of Salmanasser; but hoping to shake off the Affrian yoke, he sought aid from Se, or Sus, or Sebius King of Egypt: which being known to the Affrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and massacred it: carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Nineve in Affria, and into Rager in Media, and into other Eastern Regions, and there dispersed them: and re-planted Sammaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthe (inhabiting about Cuthe, a River in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanai bounding upon Syria, and with those of Sepharvaim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia upon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senace-rib vaunteth) also with those of Ava, which were of the ancient Avims, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling near unto Gaza, whom the Captorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Havai, willing to return to their ancient seats.

To these he added those of Chamath, or Tuerca, the ancient enemies of the Israhelites, and sometime the Vassals of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Affrian advise himself better than the Romans did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Judea and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captive: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their own thin Garrisons, which soon decayed; and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Sara-cens, who never could be driven thence again to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, happened in the year of the world, 3292. the sixth year of Ezechiab King of Juda: and the ninth of Ezechiab the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manasse.

§. I.

of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Towns.

NOW following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, joyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which Family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their sons 66400.
bearing arms. The first famous City in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Joppe, or Japho, as in the 19. of Josua: one of the most ancient of the world, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Jonas embarked himself when he fled from the service of God towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this City received many changes: and while Judas Macchabeus govern'd the Jews, the Syrians that were garrison'd in Joppe, having their Fleet in the Port, invited 200. principal Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Judas revenged by firing their Fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

It was twice taken by the Romans, and by Cestius the Lieutnant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Christ, 1250.
Lodowick the French King gave it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turks, and called Joffa. There are certain Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chains: and from thence delivered from the Sea-monster by Perseus. This fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Josephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcus Scavrus during his office of Edileship, dis-cuss'd the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome upon Jonas cap. 9. speaks of it indifferently.

The next unto Joppe was Jannia, where Judas Macchabeus burnt the rest of the Syrian Fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seen at Hierusalem, 240. furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seat, saith Will. of Tyre:
but there is no sign of it at this time, that such a place there was.

After Jannia is the City of Geth, or Gath, sometime Antbedon, saith Volateran. And so Antoninus seems to understand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Antbedon. But Volateran gives neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Protony sets Antbedon far to the South of Joppe: and Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteen miles from Joppe: where
S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the habitation and Seminary of the Anakims, strong and Giant-like men, whom Josua could not expel, nor the Danites after him, nor any of the Israhelites, till David's time: who slew Goliath, as his Captains did divers others not much inferior in strength and stature unto Goliath.

Robtani

Reobam the son of Solomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the son of Amazias destroyed it again. It was also laid waste by Azael King of Syria. Like the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruins. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the Holy war calls Ithim, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

Nor far from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsemer, or the house of the Sun. In the fields adjoining to this City (as is thought) was the Ark of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistines: and the Bethsemer presuming to look therein, there were slain of the Elders seventy, and of the people fifty thousand, by the ordinance of God. After which laughter, and the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great Abel, with S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus findes three other Cities of this name; one in (a) Nephtalim: another in Juda: and another in Issachar. Hierome findes a fifth in Benjamin.

Keeping the Sea-coast, the strong City of Accaron offereth it self, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistines. S. Hierome makes it the same with Casaria Palestina. Pliny confounds it with Apolonia: It was one of those that defended it self against the Danites and Idumeans. It worshipped Beelzebub, the god of Hornets or Flies. To which Idol it was that Ahoziab King of Israel sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Eliab meeting by the way, caused them to return with a sorrowful answer to their Master. This City is remembered in many places of Scripture.

Christiannus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Eckron. This Azotus or Ajdod, was also an habitation of the Amorites, whom Joshua (b) failed to destroy, though he once possessed their City. Herein stood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the

(c) Idol Dagon: the same Idol which fell twice to the ground of it self, after the Ark of God was by the Philistines carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Near it was that famous (d) Judas Macchabees slain by Bacchides and Alcimur the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathas: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idol therein consumed with fire: near which also he overthrew Apollonius.

Gabinus the Roman rebuilt it. It had a Bishop seat while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in S. Hierome's time it was yet a fair Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Towns within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus: and beyond the Fountain of Ethiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tjorab, or Sarxa, and Ejthaol, and between them Casra Danis near Hebron: though this place where Samson was born, may seem by the words, Judg. 18. 12. to be in the Tribe of Judah, as the other also were bordering Towns between Dan and Juda.

After these within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they find Gedor, or as it is 1 Macc. 15. Cedron, which Cendebeus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Jews, and near which himself was by the Macchabees overthrown.

Then Abdin the Native City of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulchre the seven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that height, as they served for a mark to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of years after their first setting up, as Brochard and Breidenbach witness.

There are besides these the City of Carthiarius, that is, the City of the woods: seated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Ark of God remained twenty years in the house of Aminadab: till such time as David carried it thence to Hierusalem. Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the son of Barachias, or Jehoiada, who was slain between the Temple and the Altar, also Orias, whom Joachim King of Hierusalem slaughtered, as we find in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather, as I take it, upon presumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Caspin taken with great slaughter by Judas Macchabees: and Lechis, whose King was slain by Joshua, in which also Amazias was slain: The same which Senacherib took, Ezekias reigning in Juda.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Joshua c. 19. from the ver. 41. where also it is added, that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Lebena, and inhabited it: which City, after amplified by Philip, the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Casarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Ituraea, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this City see more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountains of fame.

It hath two Rivers or Torrents: the northernmost riseth out of the Mountains of Juda: and passing by Medin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of of Sorek or Sored, whose banks are plentiful of Vines which have no seeds or stones: the wine they yield is red, of excellent colour, taste, and favour. &c. In this Valley of Sorek, is called from the River, inhabited Dalila whom Samson loved.

§. II. THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

The Tribe of Simeon takes up the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second son of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that Family while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their lives in the Deserts, there entered the Land of Promise of their issue 22200. bearing arms, who were in part mixed with Juda, and in part severed, inhabiting a small Territory on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumaea, of which the first City adjoining to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Reguli, or petty Kings thereof, were called Ascalonites: of which Volatteran out of Xanthus, in the History of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymeneus: and that Ascalus being employed by Atamius King of the Lydians, with an Army in Syria, falling in love with a young Woman of that Country, built this City, and called it after his own name: The same hath Nicolas in his History, faith Volatteran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third Book remembereth a Lake near Ascaion, wherein there hath been a Temple dedicated to Derceto, the Goddess of the Syrians; having the face of a Woman, and the body of a Fish: who, as I have said before in the story of Ninus, was the mother of Semiramis, feigned to be cast into this Lake, and fed and relieved by Doves. And therefore was the Dove worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palestino sancta Columba Syro.

The white Dove is for holy held in Syria Palestine.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest Cities of the Philistines. It bred many learned men (faith Volatteran, as Antiochus, Sofus, Cynus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the story of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod born, that feeding after our Saviour, caused all the Male-children of two years old and under to be slain. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladin defaced, Richard King of England, while he made war in the Holy Land, gave it a new Wall and many buildings. Ejus murus cum Saladinus dirigit, Richardus Anglorum Rex insurrexit, clauit Adri-chomans.

In David's time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistines: for he nameth Gath and Ascalon only, when he lamenteth the death of saul and Jonathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalona. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon stand Gaza, or Casarea, which the Hebrews call Hazzati, the Syrians, Azan, of Asonus (as they say) the son of Hercules. Other profane writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter, Pomp. Met. gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because he built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistines, and the South bound of the land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this City was far more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakim put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, it received a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza est. 19. of the Desart.

Alexander Janes King of the Jews surprised it, and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo, which fled thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not set up in the same place again, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat nearer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Town of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews, till it was lost by Simon: of which he made great account, as that he purposed to reside therein himself, and in his absence left John his Son and Successor to be Governor. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly City, and known by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the River of Bejor, standeth Ajajoma, the Port of Gaza: to which the privilege of a City was given by the great Constantine, and the place called Constance, after the name of the Emperours Son. But Julian the Apostata soon after favouring the Gazans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima. ibid. cap. 10.

On the other side of Beſor ſtandeth Anikedon, deſcayed by Alexander Jannicus, reſtored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the favourite of Auguſtus.

Then Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whole Torrent is known in the Scriptures by the name of the Torrent of Egypt, till the Septuagint converted it Rinocura: to difference it, Jf. 27. 12. giving the name of the City to the Torrent that watereth it. Pliny calls it Rhinocoura: and Joſephus Rhinocoura: (a) Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was divided by lot, between the three Sons of Noah.

Within the Land, and upon the River of Beſor they place Gerar: which by the Scripture placeth between Kadeſh and Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was near to the Wilderneſs of Beerſheba, it appears Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no marvel that as elſewhere Beerſheba, ſo ſometime Gerar, be made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a diſtinct Kingdom from the Philiftim Satrapies: the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs: S. Hierome ſaith that afterwards it was called Regio ſalutaris, the healthy Country: ſo that it was no marvel that Abrabam and Iſaac lived much in thoſe parts. Of King Aſa's conqueſt of the Cities about Gerar, ſee 2 Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Steeleg, or Tiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when David in his flying from Saul to the Philiftims had left his carriages there, but David followed them over the River of Beſor, and put them to the ſlaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir ſometime Cariath-Sepher, a City of Letters, the Univerſity, as they ſay, or Academy of old Paleſtine. In Saint Hierom's time, it ſeems, it had the name of Dama: Jof. 15. 49. it is called Urbs Sanna: from the name, as it ſeems of ſome of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arabi. For even hence alſo were theſe Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othoniel, encouraged by Caleb's promiſe of his Daughter in marriage: but that Joſua and the Hoſt of Iſrael were at the ſurpriſe, it appears Jof. 10. 39. This City Jof. 21. 17. is named among thoſe which out of Simoon and Juda were given to the Levites. And hence it ſeems they attribute it to this Tribe.

Befides theſe, there are many others in the Tribe of Simoon, but of leſs fame, as Hajim, of which Jof. 19. 7. which alſo Jof. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simoon, (for which Jannus thinks Hajim is named 1 Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Joſua theſe two are diſtinguiſhed) alſo Tholadjo, named 1 Chron. 4. 29. for which Jof. 19. 4. we have Elholad. Chazar-Sufa, ſo named, Jof. 19. 5. for which Jof. 15. we have Chazar-Gadda both names agreeing in ſignification: for Gadda is Turma, and Sufa Equitatus.

In the ſame places of Joſua and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named, which they think to be the ſame with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites purſued the Iſraelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simoon, nor within the Mountains of Edumaea. For Iſrael fled not that way: but back again to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumaea, in the Deſert.

The ſame places alſo name Beerſheba in this Tribe: ſo called of the Oath between Abraham and Abimelech: near unto which Hagar wandered with her ſon Iſmael. It was alſo called the City of Iſaac, becauſe he dwelt long there. While the Chriſtians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to ſtrengthen this place, ſtanding on the border of the Arabian Deſert, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simoon which are named in the places of Joſua, and of the Chronicles above noted, becauſe they help us nothing in ſtory, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certain of this Tribe being ſtrengthened in his own Territories, paſſed to * Gedor, as it is 1 Chron. 4. 39. (the ſame place which Jof. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the iſſue of Cham: where they feared themſelves: as alſo five hundred others of this Tribe, deſtroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The Mountains within this Tribe are few, and that of Samſon the chief: unto which he carried the Gate-poſt of Gaza. The Rivers are, Beſor, and the Torrent of Egypt, called Shickar, as is noted in Aſſer.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

OF Juda, the fourth ſon of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) periſhed in the Deſerts. And of their ſons there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing arms. Agreeable to the greatneſs of this number was the greateſt Territory given, called afterward Judea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simoon included. And many Cities named in thoſe theſe Tribes, did firſt, as they ſay, belong unto the Children of Juda: who had a kind of Sovereignty over them: as Succoth, Cariathirim, Lachis, Beſhemes, Tiglag, Beerſheba, and others. The multitude of people within this ſmall Province (if it be meted by that ground given to this Tribe only) were incredible, if the witneſſe of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when David numbered the people, they were found five hundred thouſand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chief: of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which ſtandeth in the entrance of Judea from Idumaea: whole King firſt purſued the Iſraelites as they paſſed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and took from them ſome ſpoils, and many priſoners: who being afterward overthrown by the Iſraelites, the ſons of Keniz, the Kinſmen of Moſes, obtained a poſſeſſion in that Territory: who before the coming of the Iſraelites, dwelt between Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumaea and the South, Aſcenſus Scorpionis, or Arabalim is placed: the next to Arad: ſo called becauſe of Scorpions, which are ſaid to be in that place: from which name of Arabalim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Toparchie, called Arabalimena, was denominat: of which we have ſpoken in Maſſeſſe. On the South ſide alſo of Judea they place the Cities of Jagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Aſhna, Iethnam, and Aſſor, or Chatſor, moſt of them Frontier Towns.

And then Zipb: of which there are two places ſo called: one beſides this in the body of Juda, of which the Deſert and Forreſt adjoining took name: where David hid himſelf from Saul. After theſe are the Cities of Eſron, Adar, Karkab, and Mecmona, or Haſimmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumaea towards the North, we find the Cities of Danna, Shemah, Amari, the other Aſſor, or Chatſor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes: of all which ſee Jof. 15. alſo Cariath, by Jof. 15. 25. called Keriath: whence Judas the Traitor was called ſe-Cariath, as it were a man of Cariath. Then Hethan, the abode of Samſon, which Rebo, Rebo re-edified. Beyond theſe, towards the North border, and towards Elutheropolis, is the City of Jeſhar, or Jaſbir, belonging to the Levites. In Saint Hierom's time it was called Jeſhira: and inhabited altogether with Chriſtians: near unto this City was that remarkable battel fought between Aſa King of Juda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Aſa following the victory as far as Gerar, which at the ſame time he recovered.

Not far from Jeſhar ſtandeth Jarmuth, whole King was ſlain by Joſua, and the City overturned. Next unto it is Mareſa the Native City of the Prophet Aſichaa: between it and Odolla, Judas Macchabeus overthrew Gorgias, and ſent thence ten thouſand Dragmas of ſilver to be offered for ſacrifice.

Odolla, or Hadullam it ſelf, was an ancient and magnificent City, taken by Jeſua, and the King thereof ſlain. Jonathan Macchabeus beautified it greatly. Then Ceila, or Keila, afterward Echela, where David ſometime hid himſelf: and which afterward he delivered from the ſaults of the Philiftims: near which the Prophet Abane was buried: whole monument remained, and was ſeen by S. Hierome.

Neer it is Hebron, ſometime called the City of Arabs, for which the Vulgar hath Cariatharbe: the reaſon of this name they give, as if it ſignified the City of four: becauſe the four Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but ſuppoſed: and it is plain by the places, Jof. 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 2c. 11. that Arabs here doth not ſignifie four, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants, called Anakim, whole ſon alſo ſeems Anak, was: and Acchim, Sheſhai, and Talmai, (whom Caleb expelled, Jof. 15.) were the ſons of Anak, Numb. 23. 23. The name of Anak ſignifieth Torquem, a chain worn for ornament; and it ſeems that this Anak, in body by the ſpoils which himſelf and his father got, wore a chain of gold, and ſo got this name: and leaving the cuſtome to his poſterity, left alſo the name: ſo that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amiſs be expounded by Torquati.

The City Hebron was one of the ancienteſt Cities of Canaan, built ſeven years before Tſoon, or Tanis, in Egypt: and it was the head and chief City of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given, to wit, the Villages adjoining, and the reſt to the Levites. It had a Biſhop in the Chriſtian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the mother of Conſtantine.

Not far hence they find Elutheropolis, or the free City, remembered often by Saint Hierome. Then Eglon, whole King Dabir aſſociated with the other four Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hieruſalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, and Lachis, beſieging the Gibeonites, were by Joſua utterly overthrown. From hence the next City of fame was Emas, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Go- verment or Presidencies of Judea. In fight of this City, Judas Maccabæus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Soter) gave a third overthrow to Gorgias, Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the year 1301. it was overthrown by an earthquake, both Fugitive. In the City, there was an time it had a Bilhop's seat of the Dominion of Palestine.

From Emmaus towards the West Sea, there are the Cities of Nabamus, Bethdagon, and Gader, or Gadara, or Gederothaim, of which, and of Gederoth, * Jos. 15. 35. and 41. Then Azecha, to which ojas followed the laughter of the five Kings before named, a City of great strength in the Valley of (a) Terebinth, or Turpentine, as the Valgar readeth, 1 Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seems) they feat it near unto Soco, and unto Lobna of the Levites. It revolted from the subjection of the Jews while Joram the son of Jehoshaphat ruled in Hierusalem: And next unto this standeth Maceda, which Josia utterly dispeopled.

On the other side of Emmaus towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethsora, and Bethfor: one of the strongest and most fought for places in all Juda. It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the Rock, or of strength). It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Judas Maccabæus, Lysias fortified it: and Antiochus Eupator by lamine, Jonathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Bethleem is the next unto it within five miles of Hierusalem, otherwise Lechem: sometime Ephrata; which name, they say, it had of Caleb's wife, when as it is so called by Moses before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this City was Abesjan, or Isai Judge of Israel after Jephthab, famous for the thirty sons and thirty daughters begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethleemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the famine of Juda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth the daughter-in-law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Isai, of whom David. It had also the honour to be the native City of our Saviour Jesus Christ; and therefore shall the memory thereof never end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a City of the same name: and therefore was this our Saviour called Bethleem Juda.

From Bethleem some four or five mile standeth Thebes, the City of Amos the Prophet: and to this place adjoining is the City of Bethzaccaria, in the way between Bethsara and Hierusalem: on whose Hills adjoining, the glorious gilt shields of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Jews. The City of Hezek was also near unto Bethleem, which Adoni-Beze commanded; who had during his reign tortured 700. Kings, by closing all the joints of their Fingers and toes, and made them gather bread under a mill-stone; but at length the fame ended himself by the sons of Juda, after they had taken him prisoner.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may pass by, until we come to the magnificent Castle of Heredim, which Hered erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble steps, exceeding beautiful and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adjoining to the Desart of Jermel, between it and Tekoa, is that Cleiaus floridus, where, in the time of Jehoshaphat, the Jews stood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, making one another, when they had purposed to join against Juda: near which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Jews the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange a deliverance.

Now the Cities of Juda which border the Dead Sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Roboam; and Tzohar, which the Valgar calleth * Segor: so called, because Lot in his prayer for it, urged that it was but a little one; whence it was called Tzohar, which significth a little one: when as the old name was Be-lab, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Roman time it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Hierom's time, Balexona. Then Engaddi, or Hen-gaddi, first Asphonthanur near unto which are the Gardens of Balsamm, the best that the world had called Ophobalsamm: the most part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queen of Egypt sent for out of Judea, and Hered, who either feared or loved Anthony her Husband, caused them to be rooted up, and presented unto her: which she re-planted near Heliopolis in Egypt. This City was first taken by Cbedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Judea; and one of the Presidencies thereof.

The rest of the Cities are many in the Inland, and among them Jesrael: of which which was the City of Naboth, of which already; but another of the same name, the City of Acinoman, the wife of David, the mother of that Amnon whom Abshalom slew: also, as some think, the City of Amajia, Abshalom's Lieutenant, and the Commander of his Army. But this seemeth to be an error grounded upon the nearness of the words Jisrael and Jesrael: and because the 2 Sam. 17.

25. Amajia's father is called an Israelite, who in the list of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Israelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthography sheweth that Amajia's father is not said to be of the City Jesrael, but an Israelite in Religion, though otherwise an Israelite.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills and Mountains: as those of Engaddi upon the Dead Sea; and the Mountains of Juda, which begin to rise by Emmaus, and end near Taphna; and these part Juda from Dan and Simcon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oak of Mamre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which Saint Hierome calleth a Fir-tree, and saith, That it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountain called Colli Achille, the Great of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Castle, erected by Jonabab Maccabæus, and called Massada, garnished it with twenty seven high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and Furniture for an hundred thousand men; being, as it seemeth a place unaccessable, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis, this Country had four Cities, Adama, Sodom, Schoim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their unnatural sins.

§. IV. THE TRIBE OF REUBEN, and his Borderers.

§. I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wan from Sehon King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacob's sons inhabited: of whose children there were numbered at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possess the Land promised 43700. bearing arms. But before we speak of these, or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose Land in our Writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we are to remember, that out of Abraham's kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: by Elsu, or Edom, the Idumeans: by Ismael, the eldest Son of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Retura, his last wife, the Midianites. And again, by Lot, Abraham's brothers son, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possessed by the Canaanites; and by the Families of them descended) these illues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoining.

Elsu and his sons held Idumea, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession over all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia Deserta, as far as the River of Tygris, from Sur to Havilah.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian, and passing over Arnon, inhabited the Plains between Jordan and the Hills of Abarim, or Arnon, as far North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon late down on the North-east side of Arnon, and posselt the Tract from Rabba, afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him over the River of Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon.

As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border between the River of Jaboc and Damascus, was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territory on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first posselt by the Emims, a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Cbedorlaomer, after repulsed by the Moabites, as before remembered. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territory and ancient possession of the Zamzummims, or Zutai, who were also beaten at the same time by Cbedorlaomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easy way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten the Moabites out of the plain Countries, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hesbon over Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arrival upon that out of Abraham's kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: by Elsu, or Edom, the Idumeans: by Ismael, the eldmay be that those Kings were elective, as the Edumians anciently were.

Now, all that part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Esebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amorites; and therefore did Jeftab the Judge of Israel justly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claim of the Ammonites: because (as he alledged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab, or Ammon: who (saith Jeftab) had 300. years time to recover them, and did not: whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claim them now.

And left any should marvel why the Ammonites in Jeftab's time should make claim to those Countries: whereas Moses in the place Num. 21. v. 25. rather accounts them to have been the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted, that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the Iron bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbath, the chief City of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him of his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehon's was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated Jof. 13. 35. so confusedly together, that it was hard to distinguish them; so also were the sons of Moab and Ammon, Madian, Amalec, and Ismael. Yet thereon seemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief, in Jeftab's time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Sovereignty: and again, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely, within the Mountains of Galaad, or Gilead, and as far South as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then sought how to recover it again. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sehon at Jabaz, the Ammonites had left to the Amorites all that part of their possession which lay about Aroer, and between it and Jaboc: Sehon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites, having dispossessed both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountains. For it is written in Num. 21. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon unto Jaboc, even unto the children of Ammon: so as at this time the River of Jaboc was the South bound of Ammon within the Mountains, when as anciently they had also possessions over Jaboc, which at length the Gadites possessed, as in the thirtieth Chapter of Jofua, verse twenty five, it appears.

II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

The chief Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Jefton. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two Verfes, 36. and 37. in Jof. 22. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedfon for Kedmoth, which Kedfon by writing (slit into) Jefton.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the Defart adjoining: from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Jofua, where the Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Beftor reads Beftor in folitudine Mofor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Mofor, in the border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth, near the Dead Sea (for the Country between being Mountainous, hath few Cities) they place two Towns of note, Lafa or Lefbaf, of which Gen. 10. 19. The Greeks call it Calirhoe: near which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water; all which soon after their rising, being joyned in one stream, do make a very wholesome Bath, especially for all contraction of sinews: to which Herod the elder, when he was desperate of all other help, repaired, but in vain. Others say, that these Springs arise out of the Hills of Macherus, in this Tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenies, and in Pern, called the Baths of the Inga's, or Kings. The other Town is Macherus, the next between Lafa and Jordan, of all that part of the world the strongest In-land City and Castle, standing upon a Mountain every way unaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Jannaeus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians; but it was demolished by Gobinius in the war with Aristobolus, saith Jofephus. It was thither (saith Jofephus) that Herod sent John Baptift, and wherein he was slain: his Army foot after being utterly overthrow by Aretas King of Arabia, and himself after this murder never prospering. Not far from Macherus was Beftor, or Bouza, a town of refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and near it Livias upon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Livia, the mother of Tiberius Cefar.

To the North of Livias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab; and where Phineas

Phineas

Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cofbi with his spear, bringing due vengeance upon them when they were in the midst of their sin; and from hence Jofua sent the discoverers to view Jericho, staying here until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Jof. 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The Vulgar hath torrentem spinarum; and Junius, vallum Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan; but for the Church, in which the jult being placed, grow as the cedars, Pfal. 92. 13.

The plain Country hereabout, by Moses called, The plains of Moab, where he expounded the book of Deuteronomy to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Mofor. On the South it had the great Defart of Faran, where they had long wandred. On the East it had Chaferoth, and Dizabab (of which two, the former is that Gazornis, of which Ptolemy in Palestina: the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathaei in Arabia Petraea, where was * Mezabab, of which, Gen. 36. 39. by the Geographers called Medava, and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Junius edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deut. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Livias, of which even now we spake.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Calofyria, it had Theophel: where about sometime Pella of Calofyria stood: which was in the Region of Decapolis; and as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Bu-beth-bar. It is also noted in Moses to be over against or near unto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num. 2. 14. it tranlateth the word Suph in like manner: where as in this place of Deuteronomy there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signify the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is to be taken, useth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the Region of Suph, or Suphah: which doubtless was about these plains of Moab towards the Dead Sea: where the Country being full of reeds, was therefore thus called: as also the Red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plains of Moab where Moses made those divine exhortations, some say was Bethabara, where John Baptift, which in the story of Gideon is called Beth-bara. Jofephus sayes it was where after the City Abila stood, near Jordan, in a place fit with Palm-trees: which fure was the same as Abel-sittim in the plains of Moab.

Num. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-fathaim, and Beth-fathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim: which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars than from Thorns, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Ark of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of these plains of Moab, they place the Cities Nebo, Baal-Meon, Silma, and Heshon the chief City of Sehon, and El-balel, and Kirithaim the feat of the Giants Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seems to give a note that the names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatry. For Nebo (in stead of which, Junius, Efa. 46. 1. reads Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idol-Oracle, and Baal-meon, is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idol was the Hill Nebo in these parts denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phalgab, Moses before his death saw all the land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which story Junius doth not take Phalgab, or Pigab for any proper name: but Hof. 1. 17. for an appellative, signifying a Hill: and also Vatabul in some places, as Num. 21. 20. where he noteth, that some call Pigab that top which looketh to Jericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a City of Reuben, mentioned Jof. 13. 20. called Alphoth-Pigab, which is as much as decurfus Pigeto wit, where the waters did run down from Piga. In the same place of Jofua there is also named Beth-Peor, as belonging to Reuben also called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idol was called Baal-Peor; mean, Ejey which, they say, was the same as Prapus: the chief place of whose worship seems to have been Bamoth-Babal, of which also Jof. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which, Num. 22. 41. they read, the high places of Baal (for all the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

III.

Of divers places bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

There were besides these, divers places of note over Arnon, which adjoyned to Sehon, Reuben: amongst which they place Galim, the City of Phalti: to whom Saul gave his daughter Micbol from David: but Junius thinks this Town to be in Benjamin: gathering so much out of Efa. 10. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Benjamin. With better reason perhaps out of Num. 21. 13. we may say that Mathana and Nabalid were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim, which the Prophet Hieremy threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Madan also is found in these parts, the chief City of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian, or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Jeibro inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations; of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelve thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the Plains of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompany their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer, were then slain, and their Regal City with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jeibro was Prince or Priest, forgot not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painful travels through the Deserts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adjoining to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chief City of Edom, there is that Petra, which in the Scriptures is called Selab, which is as much as rupe, or petra. It was also called Jothheel, as appears by the place, 2 Kings 14. It was built (saith Josephus) by Rezem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites: slain as before is said: after whom it was called Rezem. Now, they say, it is called Crac, and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest City of the same: perhaps which Pliny and Strabo call Nabatheæ, whence also the Province adjoining took name: which name seems to have been taken at first from Nabajoth, the son of Abraham by Keturah. For Nabatheæ is no where understood for all Arabia Petraea (at least where it is not mis-understood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Judea. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomy calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cushites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hur, Sin, and of eg King of Babylon, were parts of Arabia Petraea: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desert belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth, calls Hagarans, of Hagar.

This City Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Roman Army, and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content, by the persuasion of Anipater, to take a composition of money, and to quit it. Yet Amasius King of Juda (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) was also this City. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabite to be natural of this City. In the mean time, when the Christians held the Kingdom of Hiersusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is seated not far from Hor, where Aaron died, and on the other side towards the North is the River of Zared, or Zered, by which Moses encamped in the 38. station. Adrichomius describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon: and to be doth the Valley of Save: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it seems Adrichomius writ Nemra) refresh the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Save also cannot be found in this place, that is to the South of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Alyrian and Perjan Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Save, or Saveh, which is the Kings Dale, where Abolom set up his Monument, as it seems, not far from Hiersusalem. And at the same time Melchisedec King of Salem also encountered him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchisedec inhabiting, either near Bethsan, otherwise Scythopolis in the half Tribe of Manasse, or in Hiersusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Save, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

||. IV.

Of the Dead Sea.

NOW because the Sea of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the Salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias, which was fresh water) also the Sea of the Wilderness, or rather the Sea of the Plains, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this story also, therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let, or disburthening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a half of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which make 18. of our miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes makes it a great deal less: but those that have of late years seen this Sea, did account it (saith Hesselbargh) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length: and two and a half of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: *Lacus est in immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptior, gravitate odoris accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut sitas aquis volucres patitur, incertum unde superjecta ut solido feruntur, periti, imperitque nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of corruption: of sweet infectious, and pestilent to the borders: it is neither moved nor raised by the winds, nor indueth fish to live in it, or fowl to swim in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the unskillful of swimming, as well as the skillful, are born up by the water. At one time of the year casteth it up Bitumen: the art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the trimming of ships, and the like businesses.*

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: The fields not far from this Lake, which were sometime fruitful, and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with lightning, of which the remains remain, the ground looking with a sad face, as having lost her fruitfulness: for whatsoever doth either grow, or is set thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripeness, having nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus far Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which do still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, do look fair, and are of good colour on the outside, but being cut, have nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake casteth up, it was by the Greeks called Asphaltitis. Vespasian desirous to be satisfied of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certain Captives to be cast into it, who were not onely unskillful in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, yet notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sink.

||. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben possesseth.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Country (within Arnon) Reuben possesseth (though not taken from Moab, but from Schon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in the 21.

of Num. v. 14. nameth Iabeu, which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balaac, the son of Zippor: which Balaac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by arms, by the examples of Shoban, and Og, he hoped by the help of Balaams curfings or enchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moved by the spirit of God blest Israel, contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfy him, and to do him service, he advised Moab to lend Madianitish women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the idolatry of the Heathen, but in the end, he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evil counsel, and was slain among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: saving that we find in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Chon, and the men of Chozab, and Joash, and Sareph, all being of the tribe of Juda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens governments are no where extant or remaining, or as others, hæc prius fuerit, these Families of Juda were once thus famous: but now their posterity choose rather to abide in Rubylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we find Eglon King of Moab, who with the help of Ammon and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them 18 years: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his own house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had unto whom David fled fearing Saul, it doth not appear: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made war, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he received David, and relieved him knowing that Saul sought his life.

After this, David himself entered the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for he slaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributary: whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot, ever Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning, that he would reduce them to such an abjection, and appoint them for base services: and that he would tread down the Idumeans.

The next King after David of the time of the Moabites, whose name liveth, was Mefsa, who falling from Juda, perhaps in remembrance of the severity of David fastened himself to the Kings of Israel and paid tribute to Ahab, Reuben, Lamb, and Reuben, Ram with the wool: who revolting again from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Jeroboam, with whom joined the Kings of Juda and Edom: and being by these three Kings pressed and broken, he fled to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Edumians, invaded Jehoshaphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Edumians, and slaughtered them: and then one against another, so as Jehoshaphat had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Jeremy the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Atspha of Moab many defects: for Atspha lived with Jehoram, and this Atspha in Zedekia's time, fourteen Kings of Juda coming between, who waited three hundred and odd years.

5. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

The Territory adjoining to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joined to the Mountains, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as far to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad, the seventh son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lee, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Desart, 4550. and of their sons there entered the Land promised, 45000. bearing Arms: for the half Tribe of Manasse, the River of Jaboc divided them: from Reuben, the Cities of Heshbon, Elbeke, and Abbec.

The chief City of Gad was Aroer, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding City. But the learned Junius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2.56. Ab Heberon, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & civitate ipsa quæ est in flumine: Where the City in the River is distinguished from the City upon the bank of the River, as also in like manner, (Joel. 12. 2. 2. and c. 13. 9.) thinketh that Harobher, which doubtless belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeed seated near Har of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Har was never possessed by Moses, it is plain Deuteronomy 2. 9. where Gad forbidding Moses to touch it, saith he hath given Har for an inheritance to the sons of Lot. Now that this

City, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harobher, which is said in the same places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Junius proveth out of Numb. ch. 21. v. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers streams, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jos. 13. ver. 25. where Harobher is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seems, cannot be the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they fear not Harobher near it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah here, we must understand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar, or Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Harobher. And as for Har, (which also gave the name to the coast adjoining) it seems it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Harobher by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seems in the story of Jephtha by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites again by the Israelites under the conduct of Jephtha.

S. Hieronymus time the greatest part of this City perished by an earth-quake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saved himself in the destruction of Sodom, seated not far hence; which, they say was therefore called Vitula confervans, because as a wanton tumbling heifer, she was for thrice overthrown with earth-quakes: for which cause also Hierome seems to think that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-Salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Salissa, which hath a signification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

Brocard takes Harobher to be Petra, but erroneously, as before is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab adjoining to Edom, whereas Harobher is in the North-East border. Between Harobher and Jordan they seat Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to have built it, Numb. 32. 34. though Jos. 13. v. 17. it is said that Moses gave it to the Reubenites. Of this City among the rest of Moab, both Ely and Hieremy prophesied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about it run with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village near Arnon in S. Hieronymus's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of name to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Ely prophesied, That the w thereof should be dried up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not far from Bethnimrah in this Tribe, Adrichomus placeth Jogbeba and Nobach, or Nobe: of both which we read in the story of Gideon: and that Jogbeba was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appears, Numb. 32. 35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certain: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth, Nobach also (saith he) went and took Kenath with her Towns, and called it Nobach of his own name, where because the Verses precedent speak of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would have severed this feat of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, ver. 34. 35. 36. therefore it may seem, that this Nobach was in that part of Manasse which is in the East of Jordan, about Adrichomus place it in Gad. For whereas he supposeth it to be the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speak (a) in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkor, where Zebah and Zalmunnab rested themselves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nobach and Jogbeba, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Ely 15. and 2 Reg. 3. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certain, that it was still a principal City held by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were built by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hatrath-Sophan: for which later the vulgar makes two Cities, Koth and Sophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corone.

In the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon, together with Bethnimrah of which we have spoken, Jos. 13. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32. 36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimrah, is said to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Joshua it is called Beth-haram) some take to be Betaraphtha, of which (b) Jos. 13. 27. by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betaraphtha were corrupted from Beth-haram, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in (c) Jos. 13. 27.) or from Beth-Rephan (of which Rephan, an Idol of those Countries, we read, Acts 7. 43. and which Junius refers the name of the City Rephan, 1 Mac. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Julias (according to Jos. 13. 27. sometime Betaraphtha) the name Jos. 13. 27. placeth in the Region of Perea, beyond Jordan, which Herod Perea, as the Greek word signifieth, is no more than Regio ultior, the Country beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set down the bounds of this Perea, take more pains than needs. Fourteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Jos. 13. 27. Herod Antipas, and named Julias, in honour of the adoption of Livia Augustus his wife, into the Julian Family: by which adoption he was called Julius. Another Julius, he saith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Golanitis, which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Upon the Sea of Galilee, near to Julias in Perea, (that is, in the Region over Jordan) they find Vetezobra, as it is called in Jos. 13. 27. for Beth-zobor, which is as much as domus bisjopi. Of a noble woman of this City, which for safeguard in the time of War with the Romans, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged. Jos. 13. 27. in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she eat her own child, with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Jos. 13. 27. is placed with Beth-haram, in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon) it is plain by the story of Gideon that it is near unto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, weary in the pursuit of Zebah and Zalmunnab, he requested relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideon's return were by him tortured, as it seems under a thrashing-car or Tribulum, between which and their flesh he put Thorns to tear their flesh as they were pressed and trod under the Tribulum and after which fort also David used some of the Ammonites, though not with Thorns, but with Iron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattel, Moses, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Jacob in his return from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was upon like reason called Succoth: because there they set up their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they used after for forty years in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles, was instituted.

to the Kings of Israel and paid tribute to Abab, 10,000 Lambs, and 20,000 Rams with the wool: who revoking again from Israel after the death of Abab, was invaded by Jehoram, with whom joined the Kings of Juda and Idumea: and being by these three Kings pressed and broken, he fled to Kir-haresib, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assailed by the Ammonites and Idumeans, invaded Jehoshaphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumeans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another, so as Jehoshaphat had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Jeremy the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was Ahasa of Moab many defects: for Ahasa lived with Jehoram, and this Moabite in Zedeck's time, fourteen Kings of Juda coming between, who walked three hundred and odd years.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

The Territory adjoining to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joined to the Mountains, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as far to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad, the seventh son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Deserts, 45550. and of their sons there entered the Land promised, 45000, bearing Arms: for the half Tribe of Manasse, the River of Jaboc divided them: from Reuben, the Cities of Heshbon, Elbeze, and Aphce.

The chief City of Gad was Aroer, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rubhab Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2.36. Al Harobero, que est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & civitate ipsa que est in flumine: Where the City in the River is distinguished from the City upon the bank of the River, as also in like manner, (Jos. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. 9.) thinketh that Harob, which doubtless belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32.34. it is said that they built it) was indeed seated near Har of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Har was never possessed by Moses, it is plain Deuteronomy 2.9, where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith he hath given Har for an inheritance to the sons of Lot. Now that this

City, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harob, which is said in the same places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Junius proveth out of Numb. ch. 21. v. 15, where Arnon is said to be divided into divers streams, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jos. 13. ver. 25, where Harob is said to be seated before Rabbab: which Rabbab, as it seems, cannot be the Rabbab of the Ammonites (for they fear not Harob near it, nor in fight of it) and therefore by Rabbab here, we must understand Rabbab of Moab, which they make to be Ar, or Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Harob. And as for Har, (which also gave the name to the coast adjoining it) seems it continued to the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Cedorloamer and his Associates: but Harob by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seems in the story of Jepeha by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites again by the Israelites under the conduct of Jepeha.

S. Hierom: time the greatest part of this City perished by an earth-quake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saved himself in the destruction of Sodom, seated not far hence; which, they say was therefore called Vitula confusantia, because as a wanton tumbling heifer, she was thrice overthrown with earth-quakes: for which cause also Hierom seems to think that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bel-Salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balab, or Belab, (of which Gen. 14.2. and Salissa, which hath a signification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

Brocard takes Harob to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab adjoyning to Edom, whereas Harob is in the North-East border. Between Harob and Jordan they seat Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to have built it, Numb. 32.34. though Jos. 13. v. 17. it is said that Moses gave it to the Reubenites. Of this City among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Hieremy prophesied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about it run with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village near Arnon in S. Hierom's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Esay prophesied, That the way therof should be dried up: and all the cattle of Moab withered. Not far from Bethnimrah in this Tribe, Adrichomius placeth Jogbeba and Nobach, or Nobe: of both which we read in the story of Gideon: and that Jogbeba was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appears, Numb. 32.35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certain: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobach also (saith he) went and took Kenath with her Towns, and called it Nobach of his own name, where because the Verbes precedent speak of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would have severed this feat of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, ver. 34.35.36. therefore it may seem, that this Nobach was in that part of Manasse which was in the East of Jordan, though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he supposeth it to be the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed of this we shall speak (4) in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkor, where Zebab and Zalmunnab rested themselves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nobach and Jogbeba, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-charas, of which Esay 15. and 2. Reg. 3. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-charas, it is certain, that it was still a principal City held by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were built by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hatroth-Sophan: for which later the vulgar makes two Cities, Koth and Shophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corone.

In the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon, together with Bethnimrah of which we have spoken, Jos. 13.27. nameth Beth-baran and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32.36. (where it is called Beth-baran) together with Bethnimrah, is said to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Josia it is called Beth-baran) some take to be Betarapha, of which (b) Josephus after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betarapha were corrupted from Beth-baran, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Arama is the name of the tribe of Manasse) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idol of those Countries, we read, Acts 7.43. and to which Junius refers the name of the City Rephan, 1 Mac. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Julias (according to Josephus, sometime Batarapha) the same Josephus placeth in the Region of Peraa, beyond Jordan, which Legio Peraa, as the Greek word signifieth, is no more than Regio ulterior, the Country beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to let down the bounds of this Peraa, take more pains than needs. Fourteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Josephus. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias, in honour of the adoption of Livia Augustus his wife, into the Julian Family: by which adoption she was called Julia. Another Julias, he saith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Galilinitis, which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Upon the Sea of Galilee, near to Julias in Peraa, (that is, in the Region over Jordan) they find Petecobrya, as it is called in Josephus, Bell. Judae. 4.7.c.8. For Beth-cabul, which is as much as domus bispici. Of a noble woman of this City, which for safeguard in the time of War with the Romans, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged. Josephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger the eat her own child, with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Jos. 13. is placed with Beth-baran, in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon) it is plain by the story of Gideon that it is near unto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, weary in the pursuit of Zebab and Zalmunnab, he requested relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideon's return were by him tortured, as it seems under a thrashing Car or Tribulum, between which and their flesh he put Thorns to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod under the Tribulum and after which sort also David used some of the Ammonites, though not with Thorns, but with Iron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth fields Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattel, Moses, Gen. 33.17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Jacob in his return from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was upon like reason called Succoth: because there they set up their first Tabernacles or Tents: of which they used after for forty years in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles, was instituted.

Other four Cities of Gad are named, Jofiah, 21. 28. Ammon in Gilead, Manassah, Chief, hon, and Jakzer, all of them by the Gadites, as given to the Levites, of which Jakzer, as Cheshon, or Heshon was a chief City of Sehon, whence Nam. 22. 1. his Country is called the Land of Jakzer. It was taken by Moses, having first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the Prophecy of Eliy touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Eliy, also Hierem in a like prophecy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seems from the Ammonites) by Judas Macchabeus: as it is 1 Mac. 5. 8. where Junius out of Josephus, reads, Jakzer, though the Greek hath Gazer. For Gazer, or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Jos. 16. 2. and Jud. 1. 23.) was far from their Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, until Solomon's time, for whom the King of Egypt want it from the Canaanites, and gave it him as a Dowry with his Daughters.

Of Cheshon it may be marvelled that in the place of Jofiah, and 1 Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to have been given to the Levites by the Gadites, seeing Jos. 13. 17. it is reckoned for a principal City of the Reubenites: Adrichomius, and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Cashen, 1 Mac. 5. 26. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Judas Macchabeus, makes two Cities of one: as if that Cashen had been the Cheshon of Gad, and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, That it being a bordering City, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gave their part to the Levites, for so also it seems that in like reason Dihon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Manassah, which word signifieth a double Army, we read Gen. 22. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Host or company, to join with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. we read of a multitude of the Hosts of Heaven, which appeared to the Shepherds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so unto the godly King Offwald of Northumberland, when he was loon after to join battle with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: where the field where the Battle was fought, in the North parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this City of Manassah, David abode during the rebellion of Abishalom: and the same, for the strength thereof, Amner chose for the seat of Ishbosheth, during the war between David and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Town, which was Ramoth in Gilead, we read often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which, King Adab lost his life. Junius thinks that Ramatha Mitspa, of which Jos. 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Leban and Jakob swore one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heap, because of the heap of stones which Leban and his sons left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitspah, which signifieth over-looking (because there they called God to over-see, and be witness to their Covenant) it is plain by the place, Gen. 31. 49. That in these parts there was not only a Town, but likewise a Region called Mitspa, it appears Jos. 11. 3. where we read of the Chivites under Herman, in the Country of Mitspa, * the Town of Mitspa, as it seems both by this place, and in the eighth verse following, being not in the Hill Country, but in the Valley. But seeing that Jephtha the Judge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob (whither his brethren had driven him) dwelt in the Town of Mitspa, who doubtless was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seem that they do not well, which place this Town of Mitspa rather in Gad than in Manasse. By Judas Macchabeus this Town of Mitspa (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and the Males of it slain: for it was then possessed of the Ammonites.

Between Succoth (of which we have spoken) and the River Jaboc, was that Pemiel, or Pemmel, which name signifieth Locum faciet Dei: A place where the face of God was seen: so called for memory of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishness of which City, in refusing to relieve Gideon, was the cause that in his return he overthrew their Tower, and slew the chief Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they add Rogelim, the City of that great and faithful subject Barzillai, as it seems, not far from Nabunaima, where he sustained King David, during Abishalom's rebellion. To these they add the Town of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more than Gaddita, is ignorantly made the name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a Town, but still of a River. Alimis Adrichomius frames of Admure, 1 Mac. 5. 26. so that the name should rather be Alama, but Junius out of Josephus reads Malle, for this in Alimis: and

and understanding Malle to be put for Mille, and to be as much as Alumio (as we have showed) touching the Millo of the Sechebites, he takes this Malle to be Mitspa Adrichomius, of which 1 Sam. 22. 3. As for that Mille which Adrichomius finds in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Abaseth, which Moses notes to be as far as the furthest of Manasse's extent of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dulcena, of which 1 Mac. 5. 10. (which Junius takes to be (b) Rithma, of which Nam. 32. 13. a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Amnith, and Abel vincarnu, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Jephtha's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated, as it seems by that place of the Book of Judges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief City of the Ammonites was nearer, and not far from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometimes Rabbath, as Deut. 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that * Philadelphus which Plolomy finds in Calyfrya, Hieronymus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seems, never possessed by the Israelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regal City of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zanunim: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickedness infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who having been first beaten by the Alphians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Hormis in Seir had been) were afterwards the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Hormis by the Idumaeans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hebron had dispossessed Moab, so had Og of Bashan the Ammonites, and between them recovered the best part of all the Valley, between the Mountains and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba, or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two Moses and Israel, found all those Cities and Countries which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. years since that these Zanunim, or Raphaim, were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but having these two Kings of one kindred, and both valiant and undertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered again much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sons of Lot over the Mountains, and into the Deserts. And as the Kings or Captains of Perfia and Ajyria (remembered in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom: so by that great conquest which Moses had over those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to look back again into those Plains; and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, forsook the worship of the living God, and became slothful and licentious; they taking the advantage, invaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their Masters, sometime their Tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God: and according to the wisdom and virtue of their Commanders.

In this City of Rabba, was the Iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and four of breadth. The City was taken in David's time, and the Inhabitants slain with great severity, and by divers torments. At the first assault thereof, Urias was shot to death, having been by direction from David, appointed to be employed in the leading or an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Army perished: and wherein David so displeased God, as his affairs had ill success afterward, even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich Crown of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon wore: or which, as some expound it, was used to be put on the head of their Idol, weighing a talent, which is 60. pound weight, after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and under him twelve others.

The mountains which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those that Plolomy calleth the hills of Hippus, a City of Calyfrya: and Strabo, * Trachones: the same which continue from near Damascus, unto the Deserts of Moab: and receive divers names, as commonly Mountains do, which neighbour and bound divers Countries: for from the South part, as far Northwards as Ajroth, the chief City of Og, they are called Galaad, or Gilead: from thence Northward they are known by the name of Herman, for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites, Sehir, others, Seir: of which name all those hills also were called, which part Judea and Idumaea and lastly, they are called Libanus.

Historia Libanus, for to the Prophet Iheremy makes them all one, calling the high Mountains of Gilead, the head of Libanus.

Min. 8. 8. 9 These Mountains are very fruitful, and full of good pastures, and have many Trees which yield Balsamum and many other medicinal drugs. The Rivers of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the River Jabor: others do also fancy another River, which rising out of the Rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites wan from Og, the King of Bajan.

Jud. 10. This Tribe of Gad possiteth half the Country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabathea, as well within as without the Mountains of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wan it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expel the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the Gilites of Lot over the Mountains Trachones, or Gilead, as before. After the death of Orthoniel the first Judge of Israel, the Ammonites joyned with the Moabites against the Hebrews, and so continued long. Jephtha Judge of Israel had a great conquest over one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them again.

Afterward we find that cruel King of the Ammonites, called Nabas, who besieging Jabes Gilead, gave them no other conditions, but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he tendered to hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring flame upon Israel) because those Gileadites using to carry a Target on their left arms, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be utterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nabas, as it may seem, became the confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, though Jephtha thinks that this Nabas was slain in the battle, when Saul raised the siege of Jabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Am. c. 5. v. 26. 30. 4. 18. Hannun succeeded Nabas: to whom when David sent to congratulate his establishment, and to consumm the former friendship which he had with his father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaved the half of their beards. But afterward, notwithstanding the aids received from the Aramites, subjected to Adadzer, and from the Regni of Rehob, and Maacab, and from Jisob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were overturned: their chief City of Rabba, after Philadelphias, was taken; the Crown which weighed a talent of gold, was set on David's head; all such as were prisoners, David executed with strange severity; for with saws and harrows he rare them in pieces, and cast the rest into lime-kills. Josaphat governing Juda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them Tributaries, and they were again by Jotham enforced to continue that tribute, and to increase it to wit, a hundred talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two years.

The fifth King of the Ammonites, of whose name we read, was Baalhis the confederate of Zadekia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalhis sent Ismael, of the blood of the Kings of Juda, to slay Gedaliah, who served Nabuchodonosor.

§. VII.

Of the other half of Manasse.

The rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Og in Bajan, with the land of Hus and Argob, or Trachonitis (where in also were part of the small Territories of Batania, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Maabati, and Auranitis) was given to the half Tribe of Manasse over Jordan; of which those three later Provinces defended themselves against them for many ages. But Batania Ptolomy setteth farther off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the Desert: and all those other Provinces before named with Petraea, and Iturea, he nameth but as part of Caesarea; as far South as Rabba, or Philadelphias, likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, Reuben, and Benben, saving the Land near the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petraea: for many of these small Kingdoms take not much more ground than the country of Reuben. Bajan, or, after the Septuagint, Balanitis, stretcheth itself from the River of Jabor to the Mountains to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattel. It had also the goodliest woods of all that part of the world: especially of oaks, which bare mast (of which the of Chr. 5. 10 whence it appears, that it was part of Iturea, of which Chr. 1. 11. 4. 1. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. So they call them of Maabath, of which Maabath somewhat hath been spoken toward the end of the fifth Chapter, see the 1. Mac. 5. 56. and Deut. 3. 14. and Jos. 12. 15.

Prophet

Prophet Zacharias; Howe, O ye oaks of Bajan; and by reason hereof they bred so many swine, as (b) 2000. in one herd were carried heading into the Sea, by the unclean spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Caesars. It had in it 60. Cities walled and defended; all which, after Og and his sons were slain, Jair, defended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Country after his own name, Aveth Jair, or the Cities of Jair.

The principal Cities of this half Tribe, for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella, (sometimes (c) Buth, otherwile Berenice; by Selenus King of Syria, it is said to have been called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Maedonia: in which both Philip the Father, and his Son, Alexander the great, were born. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Jannaeus, King of the Jews, because it refused to obey the Jews laws: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, faith Niger. Carnaim, by the River of Jabor, taken by (d) Judas Macchabeus: where he set on fire the (e) Temple of their Idols: together with all those that fled thereunto for Sanctuary; and near it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which 2 Macc. 12. 22. Then the strong City of (f) Ephron near Jordan: which refusing to yield passage to (g) Judas Macchabeus, was forced by him by assault, and taken and burnt with great slaughter.

Jabes Gilead, or Jabes, was another of the Cities of this half Tribe, which being besieged by Nabas (h) King of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is (i) elsewhere mentioned. In memory whereof these Citizens (k) recovered, embalmed and buried the bodies of Saul and his sons: which hung despitfully over the walls of Bethsan, or Sethopolis. (l) Gaddara, or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Pliny on a Hill near the River Hieromace, which River Ortelius seems to think to be Jabor. At the foot of the Hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Maacherus. Alexander Jannaeus after ten months siege, wan it, and subverted it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinus (m) made it one of the five Courts of Justice in Palestine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath, or Amathus the third, Hierico and Sethopolis in Galilee, the fourth and fifth. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Afcalentia, accused him to Julius Caesar of many crimes; but perceiving that they could not prevail, and that Herod was highly favoured of Cesar, fearing the terrible (n) revenge of Herod, they slew themselves: some by strangling, others by leaping over high Towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei (o) in which, Jos. ant. 5. 13. faith, Sebeta was buried: whence others reading with the primi of Vulgar, Jud. 12. 7. Sepulchrum est in Civitate sua Gilebad, (for in una Crostitatum Gilebad) imagine Gilebad to be the name of a City, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Chesbon; the same Archeionius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gilebaditarum Civitas: so of one City Herbon, or Chesbon, which they call Esebon, the chief City of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more: This Casphor in Manasse, and a City in Gad which he calleth Casbon, of which we have admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the back of a Camel) which Josphus placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Canaanitis over against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, see this Josphus in the fourth book of the Jewish war: where he describes the place by nature to be almost invincible: and in the story of the siege, shewes how Vespasian with much danger of his own person, entering it, was at first repulsed, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length, after the coming of Titus when it was taken, many leaping down the rocks with their wives and children, to the number of five thousand, thus perished: besides four thousand slain by the Romans: so that none escaped, save only two women that hid themselves.

About four miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Josphus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolomy gives the names to the Hills that compass the Plains in which it standeth: so that it may seem to have been of no small note. It is feared far from the hill Country: on the East of the Lake, as also Pliny noteth, lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herod's Tetrarchy: it was wasted by the Jews, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were enraged against their borders.

The next City of note, but of more ancient time, is Edrebi, or Edrai, wherein Og King of Bajan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel invaded him: and near unto this his Regal City, it was that he lost the battle and his life. It stood in S. Hierom's time: and had the name of Adar, or Adara. Not far from these Towns near Jordan, in this Valley, stood Gersassa, or Gergessa, inhabited by the Gergesites, descended of the fifth son of Canaan. Of these Gergesites we read, Mat. 8. 28, that Christ coming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, lawed in their coats: where calling the Devils out of the possessed, he permitted them to enter into the herd of Pigs: in which story, for Gerges, or Gergesus, S. Luke and S. Mark have Gaderez: not as if there were all one (for Gerges, or Gergesus is a distinct Town in these parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This City received many changes and calamities: of which Josephus hath often mention. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annias, Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the City burnt. In the year 1120. it was rebuilt by Saladin King of Damascus: and in the same year recovered by Belkian de Burgo King of Jerusalem: and by him utterly razed. Near unto Gerges is the Village of Magdedin, or, after the Syriacs, Magdedin, or, after the Greeks, Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a sign from Heaven: the same place, or some adjoining to it, which S. Mark calleth Dalmathia. By the circumstances of which story it appears that this coast lay between the Lake of Tiberias and the Country of Decapolis. Brocard makes both these places to be one; and finds it to be Phiale, the fountain of Jordan, according to Josephus: but this Phiale is too far from the Sea of Gallilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmathia. For as it appears by the story, not far hence, towards the North, was the Desert of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five barley loaves and two fishes.

Of Chr. 1. 11. 4. 1. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. See Jos. 19. 37. Deut. 3. 10. 11. 12. 13. See Jos. 19. 37. Deut. 3. 10. 11. 12. 13.

On the North of this Bethsaida, they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ, it was compassed with a wall: by Philip the Tetrach of Iturea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias, called Julias, as hath been further spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Josephus makes this Julias to be the same as Bethsaida. Upon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias lands Corozaim, or Corazin, of which Christ in Matthews, Woe be unto thee Corazin.

But the principal City of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaens: and therefore the Country adjoining called the Land of Giants, of whose race was the King of Babylon, Gen. 10. 10. In Genesis this City is called Asteroth of Canaan, whence 1 Mac. 5. 26. it is called Amath, as Joseph. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth, without the addition of Canaan. The word Canaan signifieth a pair of Horns, which agree well with the name of their Idol Asteroth, which was the image of a sheep, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deuteronomy signifieth sheep. Others, from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim to have been the name of the people which inhabited this City: and expound it heroes radiantes. For of old the Raphaens which inhabited this City (Gen. 14. 5) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og rex vesdno gigantum, with the words Job. 13. 12. Og rex reliquit Raphaen: but if the Karnaim (or Carnajim) were these Raphaens, the word would not have been in the dual number: neither would Moses in the places of Genesis have laid the Raphaens in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphaens in Asteroth of the Raphaens, or some other way fittest for periphrasis: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not far from Asteroth, Adricomius out of Brocard and Ereidenbachus placeth Cedar in the way out of Syria into Gallilee, four miles from Corazin. This City (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this City understand David in his 120. Psalm: and here the Sepulchre of Job is yet to be seen, saith Ereidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greek hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth use in that place of Judith, and joyneth Carmel and Gallilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalm do rather prove that Cedar was not hercabout, than any way help Adricomius. For that they speak of Semita Cedronis, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles, that they were de colores, much more than any under the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Junius out of Lampadius and Pliny placeth them in Arabia Petraea, far from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Job, it is certain that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) say many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historical circumstances of Job are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Country seek to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded upon him, infer what his Country was, and build unto him a City by conjecture.

Of Job himself, whether he was the same like that the Amorites, who had beaten Jobab remembered in the 36. of Genesis, both Ammon and Moab, did also drive the descended from Esau King also of Idumea, though Rapertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, ward leaved themselves to the South of Ju- and Belarmine are of another opinion, de bordering the Desert Paran, and stretch- ed their habitations over the Deserts as far as Hor where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus, which gave the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the son of Aram, as Junius thinks 126. Episto to Evagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Huts or Hus, wherein Job dwelt, is from the Greek ous, which the Septuagint use for the word Huts, translated by the Vulgar sometimes Hus, as Job. 1. 1. sometime Ausitis, as Hieronymus. 25. 22. This Land is placed by Junius between Palestine and Celestria, besides Chamaaba (or Hamatha) under Palmyrene, in the Country called by Pliny Trachonitis, or Bathanae, the bounds of which Country are confounded with Basan in this half Tribe of Manasse. And that this Land of Hus was thus stated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jer. 25. 20, where he reckons the Hushites among the promiscuous borders of the Israelites, whom he therefore calleth promiscuous, or miscellanians, terban, because their bounds were not only joyned but confounded, and their Seignories mingled one with the other: but of this place the words of Hieronymus, Lam. 4. 21. speaking of the same Prophecy, of which he speaketh in the 25. Chapter, must needs be expounded, as Junius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edom, O que habitas in terra Hutz; O daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth, Filia Edom que habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the land of Hus: Hence, as it seems, some of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have said, and King of Edom, which if they understand by it Idumea, or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumea. For it is very probable that Esau, when he first parted from Jacob, did not seat himself in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Judea, but inhabited Seir far to the East of Jordan, and held part of those Mountains, otherwise called Galaad, and Hermom, which by corruption the Sidonians call Sbirion, and the Amorites, Sbenir, for Seir; and from this his habitation did Esau encounter Jacob, when he returned out of Aegyptus, who passed by the very border of Esau his abiding. It is true, that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posterity of Esau inhabited Seir to the South of Judea: for it is So also he thinketh the Themanites, of whom Job was the son of Eliphaz, who had beaten Jobab remembered in the 36. of Genesis, both Ammon and Moab, did also drive the descended from Esau King also of Idumea, though Rapertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, ward leaved themselves to the South of Ju- and Belarmine are of another opinion, de bordering the Desert Paran, and stretch- ed their habitations over the Deserts as far as Hor where Aaron died.

R 1 Eliphaz

Eliphaz was, to have been of Arabia the Desert: and Eliphaz himself to have been of the posterity of Abraham the son of Eliphaz, which was the son of Ethan. And so also Nahamab, whence Joseph the third of Job's friends (which in this place of Job 2. 11. is mentioned) is by the same learned Expolitor, thought either to be named of Thinnab by transposition of letters (which Thinnab, Gen. 26. 4. is named among the sons of Esaus, that gave denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to be the same Nahamab, which Job 15. 41. is reckoned for a City of Juda, in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that near the Land of Thue, in Babylon, as it seems, in the Tribe of Manassas, there is a Region which (at least) in later times was called Snith, or of some like name. For this is evident by the History of Will. Tyrinus, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Snith, or snites (as he calls it diversely) of exceeding great strength and use for the retaining of the whole Country: which, in the time of Saladin the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Christians, having not long before been lost, to the great disadvantage of the Country, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrinus described to be sixteen miles from the City Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius four miles Northward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manassas named in the Scripture, are these: Colan, Gebethera, Mispa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mispa of Gilead, we have spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad. The other two were given to the Levites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we have both Golanitis superior and inferior, oft in Josephus. Bebethera is accounted the Chief City of Babylon by some, but the Writers corrupting the name into Borsara, it is confounded with Beiser, or Torra of Reuben, and with horra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a City placed by some about the waters of Astorum (as they are called by Josephus) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Josephus calls it. This Lake, being as it were in the midst between Caesarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which, as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this half Tribe on the West. When the flow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, faith Isidore: otherwise more contracted, leaving the marshy ground on both sides, for Lions and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adjoining to this Lake in this Country of Manassas, Josephus names two places of strength, fortified by himself in the beginning of the Jews rebellion: Selencia the one, and Segane the other. In the North side of this half Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-East, the Scripture nameth divers bordering places towards Damascus, as Isfaded, Chauran, and Chasjar-Henan, lying in a line drawn from the West; of which three Cities we read, Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place, Num. 34. 8. where for Chauran between Isfaded, and Chasjar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauran is the name of Auranitis Regio, in Josephus and Tyrinus, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Macath, or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manassas towards the North-East) are unknown: only that Gessur was of might, it appears in that David married Mahaca the daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked and unfortunate Abisalom.

CHAP. XI.

The History of the Syrians, the chief Borderers of the Israelites that dwell on the East of Jordan.

S. I.

Of the City of Damascus, and the divers Fortunes thereof.

DAMASCUS of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beauty, antiquity, and riches, and was therefore called the City of joy or gladness, and the House of picture; and is not only remembered in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrews, faith Josephus, think it to have been built by Hus the son of Aram: of which opinion S. Hierome upon Ezay seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions he affirmeth, that it was founded by Damascus the son of of Eliezer, Abraham's Steward; a thing very unlikely, seeing the City was formerly known by that name, as appears by Abraham's calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damisco. David was the first that subjected it to the Kingdom of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadzezer their King; but in Solomon's time, Rezon recovered it again, though he had no title at all or right to that Principality: but David having overthrown Hadaezezer King of Sophena (otherwise Syria Soba, or Zeba) Rezon or Rezon, with the remainder of that broken Army, invaded Damisco, and possessed Damisco itself, and became an enemy to Solomon all his life.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from David, and Joab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphes the King of Egypt's Wives sister: of whom Taphes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning again, became an enemy to Solomon all his life, and (as some Writers affirm) invaded Damisco, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the Line of Adad that Kingdom continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the Catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians, and then the Grecians succeeded. This City was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the Rivers of Abanab, and Pharpar: whereof one of them, prophane Writers call Chysorrhoas, the golden River. Junius takes it for Adonir. The Country adjoining is very fruitful of excellent Wines and Wheat, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the Lillies being found cut in many Marbles in that Citadel. Against this City the Prophets Amos, Ezay, Jeremy, and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heap of stones. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the King Damascens, Toglatphalasser, invited by Achaz King of Juda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leaving of his own Nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, faith Hierome upon Ezay: which thing was performed by Salmanser, according to Junius in his note upon that place, five years after the Prophecy. In time it was restored by the Assaceni, and the Ptolonies; but long after, when

Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Antellus, and Lollus. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: Saint Hierome living, as he affirmeth upon the Act. it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by Haomer their King from the Romans, in the year of our redemption 636. and in the year 1147. Conrad the third, Emperor of Rome, Lewis King of France, Baldwin the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperor, Theodoric Earl of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomus Acon, on the sea-coast, determined to recover Damisco: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the year 1262. Halon the Tartar incompass it, and having formerly taken the King, brought him under the Walls, and threatened extreme torture unto him, except the Citizens rendered the place: but they refusing it, the King was torn asunder before them, and in fine the City taken, Agab the son of Halon was by his father made King thereof.

In the year 1400. Tamberlain Emperor of the Parthians, invaded that Region, and besieged the City with an Army of 120000. (if the number be not mistaken). He entered it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle, which seemed a place impregnable, he overtopped with another Castle adjoining: he forbore the demolishing of the City, in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with forty Gates, or sumptuous Porches. It had within it 9000. Lanterns of Gold and Silver: but while he invaded Egypt, they again surprized Damisco. Lastly, in his return after three months siege, he forced it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their Priests, desired mercy. But Tamberlain commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them and it to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Troopie of his victory, he raised three Towers with great art, builded with the heads of those whom he had slaughtered. After this, it was restored and re-possessed by the Soldans of Egypt with a Garrison of Mamelukes: And in the year 1517. Selimus Emperor of the Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans and Christians of all neighbouring Nations.

S. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the son of Aram, or by Damascus the son of Elihu Abraham's steward, we find no relation of their Kings, or Commonwealth till David's time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan; and therefore neglected by Moses, Joshua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Story. But were it so that it had some Regibus, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as David overthrew Adad-ezer Prince of Sophena, or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Pliny calleth Nabaz, inhabiting between Batanea and Euphrates. Now the better to understand the story of those Syrian Princes, whom soon after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the Reader may inform himself, That on the North-East parts of the Holy Land, there were three chief Principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the Stars or Commonwealth of Israel, namely, Damascus, or Aram, Sophena, or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba; of which there were the Princes in David's and Solomon's times: Razon, or Rezon of Damascus, Adad-ezer of Syria, Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the Cities subject to Adad-ezer when David invaded him, though when Saul made war against Zoba, Adad-ezer was not named. And as Josephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were levied and sent to Hadad-ezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battle slain with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the overthrow of Adad-ezer, Rezon the Commander of his Army, taking advantage, made himself King of Damascus, Adad-ezer, and Adad of Damascus being both slain. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath, or Nurva, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adad-ezer was utterly overthrowen, lendeth for peace to David, and presenteth him with rich gifts: but in dolo, saith S. Hierome, it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judeans and Israelites. But to return to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascus, Zoba, or Zoba, and Chamath, or Nurva; to which I may add Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as joyning in the Territory to Damascus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Palestina it self is but a Province, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract.) It is not a greed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later Writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Thumaz: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, and left Joab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings fled into Egypt; and was there married to Tophnes the Queens sister, as before; who hearing of David's death, and of the death of his Captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned again: and, as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expel Rezon out of Damascus, and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To me it seemeth otherwise. For, as I take it, Adad-ezer, the son of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the Founder of that Principality: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his fathers name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the title of Adad, the great god of the A Syrians, saith Macrobius, which signified Oneness of Unity. I also find a City called Adad; in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the name, or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, El-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and El adjoyned. And that Adad-ezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is againe him, that David undertook the war: Secondly, because he levied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions; for had the Damascians had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his name: Thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adad-ezer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desert as far as to Euphrates, according to Pliny: and the greatest part of Arabia Petraea, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adad-ezer, or Adad of Thumaz, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemy to Israel all the dayes of Solomon. Besides the evil that Adad did, the evil that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Thumaz, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. years after he was carried thither.

The third King of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeeded Tabeemmon, or Tabeemmon; to him Benadad, as is proved in the first of Kings: For Asa King of Juda the son of Abiam, the son of Reboam, the son of Solomon, being vexed and invaded by Basfia, the successor of Nadab, the son of Jezeboam, sent to Benadad the son of Tabeemmon, the son of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Basfia sought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, having received his presents, willingly invaded the Country of Neftalim, and took divers Cities, and spoils thence: Asa in the mean while carrying away all the Materials, which Basfia had brought to fortifie Rama withal, and converted them to his own use.

This Benadad's Father Tabeemmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benadad, his son: though it seemeth that the gold and silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabeemmon invaded Israel, before the enterprize of his son Benadad, it is conjectured. For Benadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my father took from my father, I will restore, and then shalt make streets or keepers of the borders for thee in Damascus: as my Father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument I felt were of much importance) because Tabeemmon was father indeed to Benadad which invaded Basfia, at the request of Asa: But this Benadad that twice entered upon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the son of Benadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam as before, than the son of Tabeemmon. For between the invasion of Benadad the first, in Basfia's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benadad by Achab, there past 49 years, as may be gathered out of the reigns of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. years of age to Benadad, when he invaded Basfia, and after that 49. years ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benadad at such an age should make war. Besides all this, the first Benadad came with no such pomp; but the second Benadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benadad the son of Tabeemmon invaded Basfia and Omri, and Benadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benadad received two notorious overthrowes: the first in Samaria, by a fall of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in cleit, the Israelites slaughtered 200000. of the Aramites; besides 7000. which were cruelt by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benadad, Achab again seth at liberty: to whom he redreth those Towns that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier Town, and of great importance. Now three years after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invaded Gilead, and besieged the City, being assisted by Jezebel. The Aramites came to succour and light: in which Achab is wounded, and dieth that night. After this, Benadad sendeth the Commander of his forces, called Naaman, to Joash the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Hezeu had healed him, yet he picked a quarrell against Joash: and when Joash, by Elizur his intelligence had escaped his plot, he sent men and Chariots to take the Prophet, as aforesaid. After Benadad began Samaria again, and being terrified thence from Heaven, he departed home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azazel with great gifts to Elizur, to know his estate if he might live. Azazel returning, saith to him Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benadad Adad, and the son of Adur: Amos and Jeremy mention the Towers of Benadad. Josephus writeth that Benadad and his succedours were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100. years are compast since their wars with the Israelites.

Hazael or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annoiued by Elysha, or Elizur, when he was sent by Benadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benadad should recover his present sickness: He waged war with Joash, who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Jezebel, he and the King of Juda, Azaziah or Ochozias, are slain by Jezebel, as before is said. After the death of Joash, Azael continued war against Jezebel, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Joash. He then invaded Juda, and took Gath; but by gifts from Joash he was reversed from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Jezebel, Jeoram, and Azaziah his fathers, Kings of Juda, had dedicated, and which he himself had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benadad with those treasures, when he invited him to war upon Basfia King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition between Joash and Azael, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principal persons. Lastly, 7.

Azazel vexed Joabaz the son of Jehu, and brought him to that extremity, as he left him but fifty Horse-men, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Foot-men of all his people.

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

^{2 Reg. 13. Jos. ant. 6.9.} After Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the son of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel with ill success: for Joas King of Israel, the son of the unhappy Joachaz, as he was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three several battels: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his father Hazael had taken violently from Joachaz.

^{2 Reg. 13. Jos. ant. 6.9.} After this Benhadad the son of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, only Nicholus Damascus cited by Josephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Jeroboam the second, the son of Joas, recovered Damascus itself to Juda, saith the Geneva, but better in Junius, Vique recuperabat Damascus, & Chamatham Jebude pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamath of Judas; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely, that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Jehoas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the son of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdom to his son Jeroboam the second; it seemeth that this Jeroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

^{2 Kin. 16. 9. 10. Jos. ant. 9. 6. 11.} Razin, or Razin, after Josephus, Rases; after Zonaras, Rasfon the tenth Adad, making league with Pekab, or Phacis King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vain. Then Adad alone invadeth Elath, and beating out the Jews, maketh it a Colony of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Teglatphalassar against Razin, who took him and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads, and the Kingdom of Damascus: the Affrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads, as they reigned in order are thus reckoned:

- 1 Adadazer the son of Rehob.
- 2 Razin the son of Eliadad, or Razin.
- 3 Hezion.
- 4 Tabremmon.
- 5 Benhadad, who invaded Basfa.
- 6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.

7 Hazael, whom Elisha foretold with tears of his advancement; the same who overthrew Jooram King of Israel at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which took Geth, and compounded the war with Joas, made the Expedition thirty years, and perchance more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slain Jooram the son of Achab King of Israel. For Joas began to reign in the 7. year of Jehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. years, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Jerusalem. It is also some proof that Hazael that took Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good years, being as yet seemeth, the second person in the Kingdom, and Commander of Benhadad's men of war. To this Hazael (be he the first or second) succeeded.

8 Benhadad, the third, whom Joash King of Israel thrice overthrew.

9 Razin, or Razin, the last, who joyned with Pekab King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Razin the last, Nicholus Damascus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as those of Emath, and Gesfur, we find that Tobu was King of Emath, or Camath, in David's time, to whom he sent his son Jooram with presents, after David's victory against Adadazer. Also Senackerib spakeeth of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IV.

Of Other lesser Kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Affrians, never recovered themselves again.

OF Gesfur we find two Kings named; to wit, Talmal, and his Father Amibur: to Talmal, whose Daughter David married, it it was that Absalom fled, who was his maternal Grandfather. Of the Kings of Seppena, or Syria, Soba, or Celosyria, there are two named, Rehob, or Rehob, the Father of Adadazer, and Adadazer himself; and it is plain that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a City better fitting their greatness. After Razin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria (which became so potent, and joyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia, with other Provinces into one, under Razin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For Abez King of Juda waged the Affrian Teglatphalassar against Pekab King of Israel, and against Razin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascus, and the Region of Soba, and took Damascus itself, and did put to death Razin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captive. This was the second time that the Affrians attempted Israel. For first Phul Belochus entered the borders thereof (Menabem governing Israel) who stopp'd the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of silver: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warm as yet, in his seat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his son Teglat following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the war begun between Israel and Judah, Pekab commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Razin being also wrapt in that war, and walled in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his imprefit and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possesed himself of the Cities of Nephtalim; leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his son Salmanasser, whom Polemey called Nabonassar, after the revolt of Hofa, forced Samarina, and rent that Kingdom alunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted, the race and Monarchy of the Syrian Adads in Razin, whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdom of Israel in Hofa, whom Salmanasser overturned; happened near about a time: that of Ninus in the daies of Belochus, and the other two in the daies of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Hofa ruling Judas and the other two Kingdoms were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda itself, being attempted by Senackerib, the son of Salmanasser, in vain, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly overturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. years after the captivity of Israel being in the ninth year of Hofa: that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Affria and Babylon held also the Kingdom of Syria, from the eighth year of Salmanasser; to the last of Babylas, whom Herodotus calleth Labyntius: in all about 200. years. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. years.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucide reigned therein, till it became subject unto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turks, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to do, both in war and peace, being the only people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of Truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of divers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Rebhel, Rama, Gobah, and Gibba.

OF the Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were muliered at Mount Sinia 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their illues 46000. fit to bear Arms: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim: The Cities

Cities within this Tribe nearst Jordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemed a Benjaminite; they were all three re-inhabited by Benjaminites, after the return out of Captivity, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Esd. 2. 35. where Adri- chobains reading, Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nebemia, a City called Lod- Hadid: This Hadid or Cbadid was rebuilt by Simon Maccabaeus.

Samaritan, or Tjemaraim, named of Tjemary, one of the sons of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitful Valley, adorned with many Palm-trees: and therefore elsewhere called the City of Palms. From the time of Joshua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste until the time of Achab: in whose days Chiel of Beithel laid the new foundation of it, in the loss of Abiram his eldest son, and built the gates of it in the loss of his youngest son Segub: according to the curse of Joshua: in which and other respects, Hof. 12. 14. calleth Joshua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the South-east of Jericho stood Halemon* of the Levites, of which Jof 21. 18. To the South Zetharabaz, of which Jof c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Jofia first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those born in the Desarts, and celebrated the Passover.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the etymology of this name (for it seems by the place, Deut. 11.30) that the name was known before the coming of the Israēlites into Canaan is noted Job 5.9. Ob desolationem probrī Ægyptiaci, because their fore-skins (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled down the Hill which from thence was called Collis præputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Gelgal, as appears by comparing the places, Job 15.7 and 18.17, for it was in the border of Jordan, of which Job 22.13, and Gelilotti signify borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, over against the river Hills Caraxi and Hebal: upon the one which he came yearly to give judgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was near Jordan on the East side of this Tribe and Mitspa near the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistines.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel walked yearly to come, is ^b Bethel: which also was scated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal, which was the first place where the Ark refided, after they passd over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-Jebarim, and at length to Hierusalem) when in Gilgal it was that Josua pitched up the 12. stones, which were taken out of the channel of Jordan, when it was dry, that the Israelites might pass over it: by which Story, as it is set down Jof. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passd over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was there that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mispa, whither Samuel came yearly to give judgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the revenge of the Levites wife against Gibba, and the Benjamites, Jof. 19. 20. 1. and another against the Philistins 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Judas Maccabaeus gathered the Jews (when Hierusalem was possessd by the Heathen) as it is 1 Mac. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus orationis fuerat Mispa Israel. Touching this Mispa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention four places of this name: Mispa of Juda, of which Jof. 15. 38. c. Mispa of Gilead, of which we have spoken already in the Tribe of Gad. Mispa of the Abiabites, where David for a while held himself, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1 Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chief Mispa of the Benjamites. And as in this place the chief meetings were held both before and after Hierusalem was recovered from the Jebusites, and also in the time of the Maccabaees (as the City we have said) when Hierusalem was held by though wicked under Antiochus, so also in the time of the Hickereny, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedashih whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jewry, as Governor or overseer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: until (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was slain by the treason of Jisnael, one of the royal blood of Juda, as it is Jerem. 41.

of Jos. 11. 8. as appears by that which is added, Perfas orientem, for Jeset notes the three quarters, North, West, and East, to which he followed the Canaanites, though Adrichomius and others out of this place imagine Mispe or Maspha (as they write it) in the Tribe of Asher.

Beer

Neer unto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Bethcar, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of help : where Samuel pitched up the Pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel, which (as it seems) was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministering of Justice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the illue of Joseph (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Jof. 13. 22.) and how another City called Luz (d) near adjoining to it, was built by the man of the City which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Jud. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacob's vision : and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it (e) Bethaven, that is, the house of Vanity, Hof. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well pass them over.

The Territory of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great victory of Abia against Jeroboam, of which 2 Chron. 12, was taken from them, and adjoined to the Kingdom of Juda: as it continued, as appears by the Story of Iofas: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence those coats 1 Macc. 11. 34. are called Apherema, which Greek word significeth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories, or Perfeitures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2 Chron. 13. 19. was Hephraim, which Iof. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Ethel, in this Tribe, we find three other Cities, often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gidba, and Geba. Of the name Rama, (f) it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many Towns so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they find out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seems, because Matt. 2. it appears that it bordered Ethlehem) and also out of Ebrochard and Freidenbach make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asher, as it seems, we have testimony, Jof. 19. 29. and of another in Nepthalim, Jof. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. 25. J. which more often is called (g) Ramatha, and 1 Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Jophim: for which the Septuagint (this Aut) have Aramathaim-jophim, taking the Article and the place affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, & hence they think Jephth of Aramathai, Matt. 27. 57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we read, 2 Reg. 8. 29 which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is Ramoth in Gilead, is Rama of Benjamin, located, as we said, near Bebet the uttermost South-border of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes: for which cause Dauid in the time of Ash King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did fly from him to Ash. Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I should rather think Joseph was, that buried Christ: because it was nearer to Hierusalem, and after the Captivity belonged to Juda, as it appears, Ejld. 2. 26. wherein that it is joined with Geba, it is plain that the speaker of that Rama with whole forms (after Dauid had ceased to build it) Ash (as it is 2 Reg. 2. 32.) built Geba adjoining to it: both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Geba the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda: whence 2 Reg. 23. 8. we read that Joshiah through all his Kingdom, even from Geba, which was the North-border, to Beer-Sheba, which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third City Gibba, which was the City of Sand (the wickedness of which City in the time of the Judges had almost utterly ruined out this Tribe) Adrimachus con- fronts with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently diffingually, Ejfy, 10. 27.) of which word (b) Gibba, in another place by Gibbath, he imagineth Gibbatha, another City in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinity of this City also to Rama of Benjamin appears, Jud. 19. 12. where the Levite vvvith his Wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his lodging at Gibba. By that place of 1 Sam. 22. 6. it seems that the Palace there was in this Gibba some Tower or Citadel called Rama: where Junius reads in sepa exceffo, for in Rama: but it may be that 14. 33. is the name of the Kings Palace in this City, as Rama; as it seems that in Rama was Sammel, the name of the chief place where Sammel with the College of Prophets abode, was Nazoth. The great City of Hai (for this word is sometimes an Angel late fignifying a Hill) but Adrimachus taking notice of this, build, his City Gibbah upon this Text, and placeth it in Benjamin, when as Junius enjoyned, note that this Hill was in the Mountains of Ephraim.

began again to inhabit some part of the City; and by degrees to re-build it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and Tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. years, when they again offered to revolt and rebel, Ælius Adrianus the Emperor slaughtered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himself had foretold; That there should not stand one stone upon another of that ungrateful City. Afterward, when his fury was appeased, and the prophecy accomplished, he took one part without the Wall, wherein stood Mount Calvary, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he again made it a City of great capacity, and called it after his own name, Ælia Capitolina. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sow to be cut in Marble, and set it in the front thereof, which he did in despite of the Jews Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thence-forth ever enter into the City, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place over-roping it.

Ælii. Tyr. bellif. er. l. 14 c. 12.
But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palestina, it was inhabited at length by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. years.

Oronophris Chron.
It was afterward in the 636. year after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odd years.

Ælii. Tyr. l. 3 c. 5. 18. 19. c. 1.
In the year 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Brillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crown of Gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the Successors of Godfrey four score and eight years: till in the year 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt; and lastly, in the year 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turks cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarac, or the Holy City. Neither was it Jerusalem alone that had so often times been beaten down and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in several times and ages, suffered the same shipwreck. And it hath been Gods just will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not only to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slavery; but he hath revenged himself of the very places they possess; of the wals and buildings, yea, of the soil and the beasts that fed thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertility and fruitfulness; witness the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the dayes of the Kings of Juda and Israel: it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding stony and barren. It also pleased God, not only to consume with fire from Heaven the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soil it self hath felt, and doth feel the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalec, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himself: neither was it enough that Achan himself was stoned, but that his moveables were so consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IV.

Of the vain and malicious reports of Heathen Writers, touching the ancient Jews.

OF the original of the Jews, prophane Writers have conceived diversly and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their Leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm, that while Isis governed Egypt, the people were so increased, as Jerusalem and Judas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because he was taken up and saved out of the waters. But Justin, of all other most malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He again supposeth (somewhat contrary to himself) that Israel had ten sons, among whom he divided the land of Juda; so called of Judas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sons of Israel he calleth Joseph: who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in Magical Arts, and in the interpretation of Dreams, and signs prodigious; and this Joseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foul diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men, thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found relief the seventh day, for this cause ever after observed the seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. He addeth also, that they might not marry marry out of their own Tribes, left discovering their uncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables hath Justin.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly believe them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratory of their Temple, they had the golden head of an As, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himself, having in the fifth book of his own History truly confessed of the Jews, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deity by any material figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples no Image or Representation, no not so much as in any City by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Judas with Idumea, the first parents of the Jews.

in Judea.

Claudius Iulius draws them from Judeus, whose parents were Spartan and Thebis; whence it came, that the Spartans or Lacedaemonians challenged kined of the Hebrews; but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Josephus. Some of these reports seem to have been gathered out of divine letters, though wrested and perverted, according to the custom of the Heathen. For so have they obscured and altered the Story of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood; and given new names to the children of Adam in the first age, to Noah and his sons in the second; and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and Leaders of the Hebrews; all which feignings, as touching the Jews and their originals, Josephus against Apion, and Tertullian have sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrews were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originally, taking name either of Heber, the son of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Grammarians, derive the Hebrews, or Jews, from Arabus; having mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the son of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abraham: for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chief part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the son of Jacob, and became Judeans, or Jews: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the son of Joseph, the chief of the Patriarchs of the ten Tribes, the rest of the ten Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdom of Israel fell. The Judeans continued their names, though they suffered the same servitude not long after, under Nabuchodonosor.

The government which this Nation underwent, was first paternal: which continued till they served the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captains and Leaders, Moses and Josua, by a policy Divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves to Judges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom, and his Successors, before we intreat, we are first to speak of their government under Judges, after the death of Josua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Josua, to the War of Troy: which was about the time of Jephtha.

§. I.

Of the Inter-regnum after Josua's death: and of Othoniel.

When Josua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authority over the people, and ordered that Common-weal: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdom was afterward established) to undertake the War against the Canaanites, over whom (with Gods favour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious. In the first attempt which they made, they not onely slew ten thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizzites. This tyrants cruelty, as elsewhere hath been signified, they returned in the same kind upon his own head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his own person before (before no otherwise known unto him but by his malicious imagination) made him contest and acknowledge Gods judgments against himself.

The Tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possess during this Inter-regnum (or as some think, before the death of Josiah) the Cities of Azotus, Askelon, Ekyon, and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Jebusites after re-edified. They took also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set down in express words that any one person commanded in chief over the people, as Moses and Josua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them; and that he, with the advice of Phinees, directed and ordered their wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chief, the good success which followed their undertakings, witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Josiah governed, as appears, Jos. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captains: for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his daughter Achisbah, which he performed to Othaniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made war with their borderers, from whom they onely recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron.) The rest of the Tribes fought also to enlarge and establish their own Territories. In which war they laboured with variable success: for as the house of Joseph recovered Behelem, or Luz, Judg. 1. 25. Judg. 1. 30. so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain Countries, and forced them to save themselves in the Mountains. And now the Israelites, unmindful of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better advised them in the Inter-regnum) did not only joyn themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they served the Idols of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God, whom they had provoked with their Idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia, whom Chusian Rishathaim at that time commanded.

But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight years, it pleased him to have compassion on his people, and to raise up Othaniel to be their Judge and Leader: who by God assisted, delivered his brethren from oppression, and enforced the Aramites to return into their own Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adjoining: after which the Israelites had peace forty years, during all the time of Othaniel's government. This Othaniel is thought by Jos. 1. 26. 28. to have been the younger brother of 26. 28. Caleb, for as much as in the book of Judges, he is twice called Othaniel, the son of Cenez, Caleb's younger brother. Others do rather interpret those words [Caleb's younger brother] as if they signified the meanest of his kindred. Indeed it is not likely that Caleb's Daughter should marry with her own Uncle; yet it follows not therefore that Othaniel should have been the meanest of the kindred. Wherefore we may better think that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seem to enforce. For Caleb was the son of Jephunneth, and Othaniel the son of Cenez, Caleb's younger brother; that is he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers son; to whom it was not onely lawful, but commendable to marry with his Cousin German Caleb's Daughter.

How long it was from the death of Josiah, to the government of Othaniel, it cannot be found: but it seems to have been no short time. For many wars were made in that space against the people of the Land. Leish was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that between the times of Josiah and Othaniel, that civil war brake out between the Benjamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Levites Wife. For it is written, that in those days there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes. And as Juda led the people against the Canaanites, during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done; which sheweth it to have been when Josiah was dead, and before the government of Othaniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governours, were spent under such oppression of strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attempted such a civil war, if their power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this action: wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficulty in the computation of times.

Here lived in this age of Othaniel, Pandarus, according to Homer, the fifth King of Athens; who began to rule in the twentieth year of Othaniel, and governed forty years. He was father to Eristhemus: his daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Lebece, whose daughter Semele was born Dionysius or Iiber Pater: under whom Linus the Musician lived. In his time also the Cities of Atlar, Paphos, and Tharvis were built.

Idas and Dalylus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of Iron; but Genetis hath taught us the contrary; and that Tabalcain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Bras. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus governed Thebes: whom divers Chronologers find in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were devised among the Grecians; and other Nations, during the government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vives upon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Civit. Dei, and the eighteenth book, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progeny, where he that desires his pedigree may find it. Laſantius and Ensebius make him native of Attica: and the son of Elenus King of Eleusina: which Elenus by careful industry had fed the people of that Territory in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occasion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kind of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a graven or carved Serpent; who because he made exceeding great speed to return and to relieve his people with Corn from some neighbour Nation, it was feigned by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the air.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Othaniel, and after him, with the rest of the Judges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set down, I cannot avow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better judgment. For whether Ensebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves to converse with these ancient Kings, and with the very year when they began to rule) have hit the mark of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but conjecture. Secondly, because their own disagreement and contention in those elder days, with that of our own age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet to edify any mans understanding, save his own; but that he is greatly distracted, after what pattern to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not onely in the reigns of Heathen Kings; and Princes; but even in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abraham's birth; and after in the times of the Judges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Solomon's Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seventy Weeks, and in what not? Wherefore the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men have fought by so many ways to uncover the Sun, that the days thereby are made more dark, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore give no other warrant, than other men have done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdoms took beginning in this or that year, I avow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a private opinion: which I submit to better judgements. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad unguem querenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, says Biondore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tytius, Admetus, and others that lived about these times.

After the death of Othaniel, when Israel fell back to their former Idolatry, God encouraged Moab to invade and suppress them: to perform which, he joyned the forces forces of Ammon, and Amalec into his own, and so (as all kind of misery readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest over Israel, whom God himself exposed to those perils, within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen years under Eglon King of the Moabites and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his ears from their crying repentance: but raised up Ehud the son of Gera to deliver them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the justness of his quarrel, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt upon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himself of the following victory: especially giving his Nation no time to re-establish their government, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Wars. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassador to Eglon, laden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private access, upon the pretence of some secret to be revealed, he pierc'd his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doors of his closet upon him, escaped.

It may seem, that being confident of his good success, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readiness. For suddenly after his return, he did re-pass Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army, consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victory, and that Sangar his Successor had miraculously slain 600. Philistines with an Ox-goad: the Land and People of Israel lived in peace unto the end of fourscore years from the death of Othniel, which term expired in the Worlds year 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi, with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sons, travelled into Moab, and so the story of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourscore years which are given to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as she walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipporium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the River Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if he mean not two distinct Rivers. This stealth being made known to Tyrribous, with whom Hercules and Theseus joyned themselves, they agreed together to recover her: but Pluto, or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dog, which fastened on Tyrribous, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him, and by strength took and mastered the Dog Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his delivering Theseus out of Hell. But Zexer, as I take it, hath written this story somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Tyrribous, faith he, attempted to steal Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a general name also for all fair women. This purpose of theirs being known to Aidonius, Theseus and Tyrribous were both taken; and because Tyrribous was the principal in this conspiracy, and Theseus drawn on by a kind of affection or inforcement, the one was given for food to Aidonius his great Dog Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules, by the instigation of Enrithus, delivered him by strong hand. The Molossians, which Stephanus writes with a single S, were a people of Epirus, inhabiting near the Mountains of Pindus: of which Mountains Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossians in Thessaly: but these are neighbours to the Cassopaei, faith Plutarch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya, the daughter of Erysichon, King of Athens, taken away by Erebus of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North-wind, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In this time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that she might not complain; persuading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother-in-laws merciless behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle upon cloath, and sent unto Progne. In revenge whereof, Progne caused her only son Itys to be cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so drest as it appeared to be some other ordinary food: of which when he had eaten his fill, he caused his head, hands and feet, to be presented unto him: and then fled away with such speed towards

Athens,

Athens, where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets feigned, that she was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo finds to be Daulis, in Phocis: and the Tomb of Tereus, Pausanias hath built near the Rocks Atergi, in the Territory of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things are supposed to have been done (whence also Philomela is called Daulis ales) it appears that it is true, which Theophrastus notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian War, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Country in Greece not far from Attica, a City whereof is called Daulis, was in Pandion time inhabited by Thracians, of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to have amity with his neighbours, made him his son-in-law: as it is good to believe, faith Theophrastus, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might have succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the Kingdom of Odryse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seem to have been, partly because, as Pausanias says, Daulide nec midificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines; as if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for ever after hate that place.

Near this time Atelampus (who is said to have understood the voices of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. He restored to their former health the Daughters of Prætor King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Juno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did use often to plough with Kine.

In the seven and fortieth year of Ehud, Tros began to reign in Dardania, and gave it his own name; about which time Pheonoe the chief Priest of Apollo in Delfos, devised the Heroical Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Enschibus makes King of Phrygia; and also of that part of which the people were anciently Aeones. Of Tantalus was devised the fable that some Poets have applied to the passion of love: and some to the covetous of that dare not enjoy his riches. Enschibus calls this Tantalus the son of Jupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Dionysius and Didymus in Zexer, give him another mother. He was said to be the son of Jupiter, as some will have it; because he had that Planet in his ascendant, betokening Wildom and Riches. It is said, that when he made a feast to the gods, having nothing more precious, he cutted his own son to be slain and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres are part of one of the shoulds; whereby was signified, that those men which seek after Divine knowledge, prefer nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their own children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was devised, that he had always Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacy of the world, yet his mind being otherwise, and to higher desires transported, he enjoyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom David:

Quærit aquas in aquis, & pomâ jugâcia capitat.

Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and deth mis.

The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted upon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and virtue to mortal men: which story Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise, and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirsty of more abundance, was never satisfied. Of whom Horace against covetousness.

Tantalus à labiis sitiens fugientia capat Phœnixa; quid ridet? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streams that from him flee. Why laughest thou the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is feigned of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods, to vain and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus, Coetaneis conviciis. Nectar Ambrosiaque dedit.

T t

Because

Because that stealing immortality,
He did both Necliar and Ambrosia give To guests of his ownage, to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Divinity ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneſt meats in a ſoul ſtomack, are therein corrupted, ſo the moſt high and reſerved myſteries are often perverted by an unclean and deſiled mind.

To you it is given (ſaith Chriſt in Mark) to know the myſtery of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are without, all things be done in Parables. So it is ſaid of him, that he expounded all things to his Diſciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzene infer upon a place of S. Paul: Quod ſi Paulo li- vit, forte de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius conſarct; ſi Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third Heavens, and his going thither, did bring unto him, peradventure we might know ſomewhat more of God.

Pythagoras ſaith Reſectin thought it not the venture we might know ſomewhat more of God.

And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their myſteries among their Priests in certain Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their ſecrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might beſtow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehnd, with him it is alſo ſaid, that Tytius lived, whom Apollo ſlew, becauſe he ſought to force his mother Latona. Euphori- on hath it thus, that Tytius was the ſon of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Ju- no's revenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where ſhe was delivered of Tytius: whoſe Mother dying, and himſelf therein nourished, he was therefore called the ſon of the earth. Panſa- nias ſpeaking of the grave of this Giant, affirms, that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his ſtature out of Homer:

Porreſque novem Tytius per jugera terra.
Aſſidius atro viſcere paſcit aces.

Nine furlongs ſtrecht lies Tytius, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry Birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; That Apollo killing this cruel and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a City in Phocia, it was feigned by the Poets, to the terrour of others, That he was ſtill eaten in Hell by birds, and yet ſtill lived, and had his fleſh renewed.

Admetus, King of Theſſaly, lived alſo in this age, whom it is ſaid that Apollo firſt ſerved as a Herd-man, and afterward, for his excellent wit, was by him advanced; but having ſlain Hyacinthus, he croſt the Helleſpont, and ſled into Phrygia: where, together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in brick, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leap into their places by playing on his Harp: according to him in Ovid, which ſaith:

Ilion aſpices, firmataque turribus altis
Atenia, Apollineæ ſtruda canore lyra.

Strong Ilion thou ſhalt ſee with walls and towers high,
Built with the harp of wife Apollo's
Harmony.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this work.
And that he alſo laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians wit-neſſes, ſaith Panſanias.

In theſe dayes alſo of Ehnd, or (as ſome ſind it) in the dayes of Deborah, lived Perſe- us, the ſon of Jupiter and Danae, by whole Souldiers (as they ſailed out of Peloponneſus, to ſeek their adventure on Africa ſide) Me- duſa, the Daughter and Succellor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as the hunted, near the Lake Tritan, was ſurprized and ſlain:
where becauſe, when Perſeus beheld, he cauſed her head to be embalmed, and caried into Greece: the beauty whereof was ſuch, and ſo much admired, and the beholders ſo aſtoniſhed which beheld it, as there of grew the fiction, That all that looked on Meduſa's head, were turned into ſtones.

Cecrops, the ſecond of that name, and 7.
King of Athens, and Acriſius the 13. or, after Encheirus.

Encheirus, the 14. King of the Argives, began alſo their reigns, as it is ſaid, in the time of this Judge: of which the firſt ruled 40. years, and the ſecond 31. years. Alſo Belle- rophon lived in this age, being the ſon of Glancus, the ſon of Siphon: who inticed by Antea, or Sthenobia, the wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompany her, but reſuſing it, ſhe accuſed him to her husband, that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus ſent Bellerophon into Lycia, about ſome affairs of weight, between him and his ſon-in-law Jobates: giving ſecret order to Jobates to diſpatch him: but Jobates thinking it diſho-nourable to lay violent hands on him, im-ployed him againſt Chimæra, a Monster vomiting, or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocency, ſent him the winged Horſe, Pegasus, ſprung up of the blood of Meduſa, formerly ſlain by the ſouldiers of Perſeus in Africa, to transport him; a horſe that none other could maſter or bridle but Minerva: upon which beaſt Bellerophon overcame Chimæra: and performed the other ſervices given him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambuſh to have ſlain him: but being victorious alſo over all thoſe, he arrived to Jobates in ſafety: whom Jobates for his eminent virtues honoured, firſt with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew ſo inſolent, as he attempted to ſile up to heaven upon his Pegasus: whoſe pride Jupiter diſdaining, cauſed one of his ſtinging flies ſo to vex Pegasus, as he caſt off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blind; of which burthen Pegasus being diſcharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heaven: and being ſed in Jupiter's own ſtable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sun. This tale is diverſly expounded; as firſt by ſome, That it pleaſed God to relieve men in their innocent and undeſerved adverſity, and to caſt down thoſe which are too high minded: according to that which is ſaid of Bellerophon:
that when he was expoſed to extream hazard, or rather certain death, he found both deliverance and honour: but waxing over-proud and preſumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremity of ſorrow, and ever-during mile-ry. Secondly by others, That under the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruel Pyrat of the Lycians, whoſe ſhip had in her prow a Lyon, a Goat in the mid-ſhip, and a Dragon in the ſtern, of which three beaſts this Monster Chimæra was ſaid to be compounded, whom Bellerophon purſued with a kind of Galley, of ſuch ſwiftness, that it was called the flying Horſe: to whom the invention of ſails (the wings of a ſhip) are alſo attributed. Many other expolitions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ſhip, for ſo Virgil calleth one of the greateſt ſhips of Æneas.

Ion alſo, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquity of their parent Javan) derive their name of Ioncs, is ſaid to have been about Ehnd's time: Homer calls them Jaones, which hath a near reſemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be ſo that Ion himſelf took name from Javan:
it being a cuſtom obſervable in the Histories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a fore-father, in ſome the principal of his iſſue.

The invasion of India by Liber-Pater, is by ſome reported as done in this age: but
S. Auguſtine makes him far more ancient: placing him between the coming out of E- gypt, and the death of Jofua.

About the end of the 80. years, aſcribed to Ehnd, and Sangar, Pelops flouriſhed: who gave name to Peloponneſus in Greece, now called Morca.

§. IV.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

AFTER Iſrael had lived in peace and plenty to the end of theſe 80. years, they again began to forget the giver of all goodneſſes, and many of thoſe being worn out, which were witneſſes of the former miſery, and of Gods deliverance by Ehnd; and after him by Sangar; the reſt began to return to their former neglect of Gods commandments. For as Plenty and Peace are the parents of idle ſecurity: ſo is ſecurity as fruitful in begetting and bringing forth both danger and ſubverſion: of which, all eſtates in the world have taſted by interchange of times. Therefore when their fins were again ripe for puniſhment, Jabin King of Ha- zor, after the death of Ehnd, invaded the territory of Iſrael; and having in his ſervice 900. iron Chariots, beſides the reſt of his forces, he held them in ſubjection twenty years, till it pleaſed God to riſe up Deborah, the Prophetess, who encouraged Barac to levy a force out of Neptalim, and Zabulon, to in-counter the Canaanites. That the men of Neptalim were more forward than the reſt in this action, it may ſeem to have proceeded partly from the authority that Barac had

T t 2 among

among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible than in others, because Honor and Harosheth the chief holders of Jabin, were in Negebathim. So in the days of Jephtha the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites, with whom the War was, pressed most upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Israel from the Midianites: and by the counsel and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Jael the Kenite's wife: so was it his will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resistless, he overthrew by his own imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchless pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by invisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Army of Senacherib by his Angel, or as he did the Egyptians in Moset time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by hail-stones in the time of Josua: sometimes by the ministry of men, as when he overthrew the four Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the household servants of Abraham. He caused the Midianites and Ammonites to set upon their own confederate the Army of the Edomites; and having slain them, to kill one another in the sight of Jehoshaphat: and of the like to cite a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetess speak unto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victory all the strength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last man: in the end of which War it seemeth that Jabin himself also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which, Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgment of all his powerfulness, and great mercies, she sheweth the weak estate wherinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Was there a shield or spear seen among forty thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were fevered and amazed, some of them confined over Jordan, and durst not joyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Assyrites kept the Sea-coast, and forsook their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan, who neighbored the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. She then curseth the Inhabitants of Alroez, who dwelling near the place of the battle (be-like fearing the success) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affliction of that race to the Israelites. For though the Family of Heber were enforced in that miserable time of bondage, to hold correspondency with Jabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their love and faith to their ancient Friends. Lastly, she derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her Son the victory in her own hopes: and fancied, to her self, and described the spoils both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, she directeth her praise and thanks to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Jabin's oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40. years. In which time the Kingdom of Argos, which had continued 544. years, was translated to Aycene: The translation of this Kingdom, Vine out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Dabauus, Lyncus succeeded in Argos, after whom the Children of Abas the Son of Lyncus divided the Kingdom; of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos in self: Enchus his brother possessed Epiphra, or Corinth, and Tirythos, and other Cities, with all the Territory towards the Sea: these being many Monuments in Tirythos, which witness Praetis possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that he should be slain by the son of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompany her. But the Lady being exceeding fair, it is said that Jupiter turned himself into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with child: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings son, or other worthy man, corrupted her, of whom Perseus was born; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Cicero) or in shewing his grand-father the invention of the difcus, or leaden ball, slew him unwillingly: After this, Perseus, to avoid the infamy of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Uncle Praetis: and built Aycene. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that she was inclosed in a brazen vault under the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Upon this close custody Horace hath this witty observation:

Inchsam Danaen turris aenea,
Robustaque fores, & vigilum caenum
Triplex excubie munierant satis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:

Simon Acrisium Virginis abdite
Custodem pavidum, Jupiter & Venus Riffest, fore enim intum iter & patens Converso in pretium Deo.

Aurem per medios ire satellites,
Et perumpere amat saxa, potentius Ille fulmineo.

The brazen tower with doors close barr'd,
And watchful bandogs frightful guard,

Kept safe the maidenhead
Of Danae from secret love:
Till smiling Venus, and wile Jove
Beguil'd her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden shower,
The god into her lap did poure
Himself, and took his pleasure.
Through guards and stony valls to break,
The thunder-bolt is far more weak,
Than is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argives were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reign in the first year of Jacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time, to the end of Sthenelus, Castor misreckoneth 400. years. This kingdom before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to have stood 544. years, others but at 417. To was the daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Ifr.

Triopas,

Pelops.

After the translation to Aycene, Mar. Secus finds these Kings:

Tisamenus, Pentiblus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leave out the two first, and the last, beginning with Eurydiceus: and ending with Pentiblus. In Tisamenus time the Heraclides returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Deborah, were Midas, who reigned in Phrygia: and Ilus, who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronological Table, as Contemporaries with Deborah.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dadalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this Age.

Deborah and Barac being dead, the Midianites, assisted by the Amalekites, infested Israel. For when, under a Judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or prosperity: The Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did master them in a short time (the hand of God being withheld from their defence) as to save themselves, they crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plains and fruitful vallies: and in harvest time, by themselves, and the multitude of their cattle, destroying all that grew up: covering the fields as thick as grasshoppers: which servitude lasted seven years.

Then the Lord by his Angel stirred up Gideon the son of Josab, afterward called Jud. 6. 11. Jerubbaal: whose fear and unwillingness, and how it pleased God to hearten him in his enterprise, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hosts. Each of these 300. by Gideon's appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which he gave the great Army of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so loud a noise, and seeing (at the crack of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Army of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sudden fear, they all fled without a stroke stricken, and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slain.

flaia. In his return the Ephraimites began to quarrel with Gideon, because he made war without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprise) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appealing them with a mild answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tired with travel, and weary even by the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired relief from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might overtake the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebab and Zalmonna; which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, fought the like relief from the Inhabitants of Peniel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the revenge, which in his return from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would tear the flesh of those of Succoth with thorns and briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and City of Peniel. Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse relief to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victory: if I may presume to make conjecture, it seems likely, first, that those Cities set over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, and were not spoiled by them; or else they knowing that Zebab and Zalmonna were escaped with a great part of their Army, might fear their revenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to find of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the war, that both envy and maligne others, if they perform any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their own Country, though themselves may be assured to bear a part of the smart of contrary success. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Country should suffer hazard and want, than that such men as they dislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or wheresoever it were that he refreshed himself and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the uttermost: and finding Zebab and Zalmonna in Karkor (suspecting no further attempt upon them) he again surprized them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he took Zebab and Zalmonna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideon's brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request slew them with his own hands, his Son whom he first commanded to do it, refusing it; and in his return from the consummation of this marvellous victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Peniel: forgiving no offence committed against him, either by strangers, or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are never left unsatisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and unusual torments, so were his own 70. sons, all but one, murdered by his own bastard Abimelec: The like Analogy is observed by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, others of them to be cast into the River and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their own first-born by his Angel, and drowning Pharaoh and his Army in the Red Sea. And hereof a world of examples might be given both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reverence Gideon in the present for his victory, and there own deliverance, as they offered him the Sovereignty over them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not reign over you, neither shall my childre reign over you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden ear-rings which every man had gotten. For the Israelites, used to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seven hundred shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. li. if we follow the account of the shekle vulgar. And because he converted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silk, purple, scarlet, and fine linen, belonging to the High Priest only, and set up the same in his own City of Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the time was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kind of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Levites used, and so did David when he danced before the Ark: and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of linnen only.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 150000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained, we may remember, that although Gideon with 300. gave the first alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder; yet all the rest of the Army came in to the slaughter, and pursuit: for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephthali, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this Army Gideon left in Tents behind him, when he went down to view the Army of his enemies, who with the noise of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There lived with Gideon, Agens, the son of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Eurycles King of Mysene: Atreus and Thyestes the sons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Eurycles, the Kingdom of Mysene fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in jealousy, as an attempter, both of his Wife and Crown, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be dressed, did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not unrevenged. For both Atreus and his son Agamemnon was slain by a base son of Thyestes, yea the grand children, and all the lineage of Atreus died by the same sword.

In Gideon's time also those things were supposed to have been done, which are written of Dedalus and Icarus. Dedalus, they say, having slain his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour; where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, having made for Minos's Labyrinth, like unto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to have framed an artificial Cow for Pasiphae the Queen, that she, being in love with a fair Bull, might by putting her self into the Cow, satisfy her lust; a thing no less unnatural than incredible, had not that shameless Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpose, as may seem, to verifie the old Fable. For so it appears by those Verks of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifies the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

*Junctam Pasiphaen Diisæo credite Tauro Vidimus, accepi fabula prisca fidelem.
Nesci miratur Cæsar, longæva vetustas Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Servius makes a less unonest construction of it, thinking that Dedalus was of her counsel, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretary of Minos called Taurus, which signifies a Bull, who begat her with child; and that the being delivered of two sons, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Atreus, it was feigned that she was delivered of the Monster Atrotaur, half a Man, and half a Bull. But this practice being discovered, and Dedalus appointed to be slain, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicil: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was feigned that he fashioned wings for himself and his son to transport them. For whereas Atreus pursued him with boats which had oares only, Dedalus framed sails both for his own boat, and for his sons, by which he out-went those that had him in chase. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himself over-bold, was over-born and drowned.

It is also written of Dedalus, that he made Images that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with legs, arms, and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could only present the body and head of those men, whom they carried to counterfeite, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seen some of those that were called the Images of Dedalus found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the son of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sun and Moons course, and of the generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was slain by Hercules his Scholar with his own Harp.

Again, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthians Army, led and slain, by Oedipus overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom she maledered, was meant by the rocky and unaccessible Mountain near Thebes, which the defended; and Oedipus dissolving her problem, his victory over her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lion, for her cruelty. But that which Pasiphaus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, ward signifieth Disban. Afterwards he sent many of his Subjects to kick the ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not back Andra, they should sink in her stead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus: which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter, offended with the slaughter of Alphius, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whether; when they came to the Islands Alphitides, there the ship Argo, (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them and said, that the anger of Jupiter should not cease, till they came to Aufonia, and were cleansed by Circe, from the murder of Alphius. Now they thereupon sailing between the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the Sea of Sardinia, and alongst the coasts of Hetruria, came to the Isle of Aea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleansed them. Thence they sailed by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well, that he stayed them. Onely Eutes swam out unto them, whom Venus ravished, and carried to Lylbeum in Sicily to dwell.

Having past the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Caribdis, and the fragling Rocks, which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoak. But Thetis and the Nereides, conveyed them safe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coasted Sicilie, where the Beeves of the Sun were, and touched at Coryra, the Island of the Phaeaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Mean while the men of Colchos, that had been sent by Etes in quest of the ship Argo, hearing no news of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betook themselves to new habitations: Some of them dwelt in the Mountains of Coryce, others in the Islands of Alphitides, and some coming to the Phaeaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Andra of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if the were not Jafons wife, they should have her; but if she were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos, not daring to return home, stayed with the Phaeaces, so the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Island Minos reigned, who had a man of brags given to him (as some of the Fabelers say) by Vulcan. This man had one vein in his body reaching from the neck to the heel, the end whereof was closed up with a brazen nail; his name was Talus, his custome was to run thrice a day about the Island for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo pass by, he threw stones at it, but Andra with her Magick destroyed him. Some say that she flew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortal, she drew out the nail that stopt his vein, by which means all his blood ran out, and he died: others there are that say he was slain by Pean, vvho vvounded him vvith an arrow in the heel. From hence the Argonauts sailed to Agina, where they were fain to fight for fresh vvater. And lastly, from Agina they sailed by Euboea and Locris, home to Jolcor, vvhere they arrived, having spent four whole months in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Jafon, understand the miterly of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to vvhich also, other super-line Chymists draw the twelve labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks, that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden book of Parchment, which is of sheep-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmuted. Others vvould signifie by Jafon, Wisdom, and Moderation, vvhich overcometh all perils: but that which is most probable, is the opinion of Dercitus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Jafon with the rest went indeed to rob Colchos, to vvhich they might arrive by boat. For not far from Caucasus there are certain steep falling torrents vvhich vvash down many grains of Gold, as in many other parts of the World; and the people there inhabiting use to set many fleeces of vvool in those delcets of vvaters, in which the grains of gold remain, and the vvater passed thorow, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and currents, in the passage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Poetically converted into those fiery Bulls, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleep, and the like. The man of brags, the Syrens, Scylla and Charibdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterranean Sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, under Poetical morals: all which Homer afterward used (the man of brags excepted) in the description of Ulysses his travels on the same In-land seas.

of Abimelech, Tholan, and Jair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theseus, Hippolytus, &c.

AFTER the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base son, begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offers had been made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetual Princes; and, as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Sovereignty, practised with the Inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himself; who being easily moved with the glory, to have a King of their own, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed seventy pieces of silver of their Idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hired a company of loole and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his seventy brethren, the sons of Gideon, begotten on his Wives, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Jotham the youngest, who hid himself from his present fury: all which he executed on one stone; a cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose revenges are without date, and for everlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preservation of every being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beaury which never dieth, and with love that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the souls of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is itself the child and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it self set down, forgetting nothing (how fearful and inhumane soever) which may serve it: remembering nothing, whatsoever justice, piety, right or religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weakness of the undertakers, and rather praisheth the adventure, than feareth the like success. It was the first sin that the World had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into Hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his natural corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Devil, which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as besetting every age, and mans condition.

Judg. 9. 41

Jotham, the youngest of Gideons sons, having escaped the present peril, sought by his best persuasions to alienate the Sechemites from the assisting of this merelleis Tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subjection, had refused to receive as unlawful, what others had no power to give, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the Olive, which contented it self with its Fatness, the Figge-tree with its sweetnes, and the Vine with the good juice it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut down all the rest, and accepted the Sovereignty. He also fore-told them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men back whom rage without right led on) Gad the son of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem from the Service of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entered the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the Town, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Zebur, himself was wounded in the head with a stone thrown over the wall by a woman; and finding himself mortally bruised, he commanded his own Page to pierce his body, thereby to avoid the dishonour of being slain by a feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the Government the Lapythæ and Centaurus made war against the Thebans. These Nations were defended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that devised to manage horses, to bridle and to sit them: inasmuch, as when they first came down from the Mountains of Pindus, into the plains, those which had never seen horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans, when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first invaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Tholo of Uphar governed Israell 23. years, and after him Jair the Gileadite 22. years, who seems to be defended of Jair the son of Mansse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his own name, Havoth Jair. For to this Jair there remained thirty of those Cities which his Ancestor had recovered from the Amorites Of these Judges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument, that during all their times Israel lived without disturbance, and in peace.

Jud. 10.

In T. 6.

When Jair judged Israel, Priamus began to reign in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captive with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransom, he re-built and greatly strengthened and adorned Troy; and so far enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the less. He married Heceba the Daughter of Cilixus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fifty sons, whereof seventeen by Heceba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his Aunt Hesione, took Helen the Wife of Menelaus, the cause of the war which followed.

Thebes the tenth King of Athens, began likewise to reign in the beginning of Jair: some Writers call him the son of Neptune and Aethra: but Plutarch in the Story of his life, finds him begotten by Aegens, of whom the Grecian Sea between it and Asia the less took name. For when Aegens had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forc'd them to pay him seven of their sons every year for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be devoured by the Monster Minotaur: because belike the sons of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queen, had the charge of them: among these seven Thebes thrust himself, not doubting by his valour to deliver the rest, and to free the Country of that slavery occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his son.

And having possist himself of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he received from her a bottom of three, by which he conducted himself through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the City of Crocodiles in Egypt; by means whereof having slain Minotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his father Aegens had given order, that if he came back with victory and in safety, he should use a white sail in sign thereof, and not that mournful black fail under which they left the port of Athens: This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Aegens decrying the ship of Thebes with a black fail, did cast himself over the Rocks down into the Sea, afterward called of his name Aegum.

One of the first famous acts of Thebes, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage between Atagara and the Peloponnesian Isthmus, and threw all whom he mastered into the Sea, from the high Rocks. Afterward he did the like to Ceryon, by wrestling, who used by that art to kill others. He also rid the Country of Procrustes, who used to bend down the strong limbs of two trees, and fastned by cords such as he took, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the springing up tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischievous thieves and murderers. He overthrew the Army of the Amazones, who after many victories and valuations, entered the Territory of Athens. Thebes having taken their Queen Hippolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolitus; with whom afterward his mother-in-law Phedra, falling in love, and he refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phedra persuaded Thebes, that his son offered to force her: after which it is feigned, that Thebes besought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his sons by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of advantage, sent out his Sea-Calves, as Hippolitus passed by the Sea-shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces. Which miserable and undeserved destiny, when Phedra had heard of, she strangled her self. After which it is feigned, that Diana intreated Aesculapius to set Hippolitus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolitus, when his father fought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receive many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Aesculapius to wit, some skilful Physician, or Chirurgion, healed again: after which he passed into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a Hunter, in which he most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stories Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the World, where they find many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange Beasts, Birds, and Fish, and with Mathematical lines; so do the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the Tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Thebes did many great things in imitation of Hercules; whom he made made his pattern, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggarly, mutable, and ungrateful multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per Ostracismum, by the Law of Lots, or names written on shells, which was a device of his own.

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was fifty years old, from Aphidna, which City Castor and Pollux overturned, when they followed after Thebes to recover their sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write, that Thebes begot her with child at Argos, where he erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and so doth Ovid, Non tamen ex facta fructum tulit ille petitus, &c. Therape Eusebius finds in the first of Jair, who governed Israel twenty two years, to whom succeeded Jephth or Jepte, six years, to whom Iboan, who ruled seven years, and then Habdon eight years: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Thebes had a child by her in the first of Jair, (at which time we must count her no less than fifteen years old: for the women did not commonly begin so young as they do now) she was then at least two and fifty years old at the destruction of Troy; and when she was stolen by Paris, eight and thirty: but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting, with Halicarnaceus, do in effect consent, that the City was entered and burnt in the first year of Demophoon King of Athens, the Successour of Minos, the Successour of Thebes, seventeen daies before the Summer Tropick; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojans crost the Hellspont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second year, the next Summer they arrived at Laurentium, and builded Lavinium. But S. Augustine hath otherwise, That when Polyphides governed Scycon, Minos, Athens, Tantamus, Assyria, Habdon, Israel, then Eneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty ships the remainder of the Trojans: but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

In Sicily, Thebes the two and twentieth King, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Troia. His Successours, Adrastrus, who reigned four years, and Polyphides, who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jair; so is also Minos King of Athens and Aireus, who

§. VIII.

Of the war of Thebes, which was in this age.

In this age was the War of Thebes, the most ancient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection:

— Si nulla fuit genitalis origo Errumque & mundi semperque aeterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troiae,
Non alias atri quoque res cecidere Poetae?

If all this World had no original, But things have ever been as now they are: Before the siege of Thebes, or Troy last fall, Why did no Poet sing some elder War?

It is true, that in these times Greece was very salvage, the Inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they used little; neither did they plant many trees, or sow more corn than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none; for it is thought that the name of money was not heard of in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the value of Gold and Brads: by the worth in cattle: saying, that the golden Armour of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeves; and the Copper Armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steal horses or kine was the usual exercise of their great men. Their Towns were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Aegene the principal City in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in some small Towns of that half Isle of Peloponnesus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietness within their

He also rid the Country of Procrustes, who used to bend down the strong limbs of two trees, and fastned by cords such as he took, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the springing up tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischievous thieves and murderers. He overthrew the Army of the Amazones, who after many victories and vastations, entered the Territory of Athens. Theseus having taken their Queen Hippolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolitus; with whom afterward his mother-in-law Pheдра, falling in love, and he refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Pheдра perswaded Theseus, that his son offered to force her: after which it is feigned, that Theseus besought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his sons by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of advantage, sent out his Sea-Calves, as Hippolitus passed by the Sea-shore, and so affrighted his horses, as cast and the Coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces. Which miserable and undeserved destiny, when Pheдра had heard of, she strangled her self. After which it is feigned, that Diana intreated Esculapius to set Hippolitus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolitus, when his father fought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receive many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Esculapius, so wise, skilful Physician, or Chirurgion, healed again: after which he passed into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a Hunter, in which he most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stories Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the World, where they find many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange Beasts, Birds, and Fishes, and with Mathematical lines; so do the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermix the Tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made made his pattern, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggarly, mutable, and ungrateful multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per Ufraculum, by the Law of Lots, or names written on thels, which was a device of his own.

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was fifty years old, from Aphidna, which City Castor and Pollux overturned, when they followed after Theseus to recover their sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write, that Theseus begot her with child at Argos, where she erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and so doth Ovid, Non tamen ex sulis fructum tulit

the rape Eusebius finds in the first of Jair, who governed Israel twenty two years, to whom succeeded Jephia or Jepte, six years, to whom Ikan, who ruled seven years, and then Habdon eight years: in whole time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Theseus had a child by her in the first of Jair, (at which time we must count her no less than fifteen years old: for the women did not commonly begin so young as they do now) she was then at least two and fifty years old at the destruction of Troy: and when she was stolen by Paris, eight and thirty: but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Eusebius and Brentius, with Halicarnassenses, do in effect consent, that the City was entered and burnt in the first year of Demophoon King of Athens, the Successour of Mintheus, the Successour of Theseus, seventeen daies before the Summer Tropick; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojans crost the Hellepont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second year, the next Summer they arrived at Lawrentium, and builded Lavinium. But S. Augustine hath otherwise. That when Polyphides governed Sicyon; Amesibius, Athens; Tantanes, Allyria; Habdon, Israel; then Eneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty ships the remainder of the Trojans: but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia, Phesus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Tbola. His Successours, Adraflus, who reigned four years, and Polyphides, who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jair; so is also Amesibius King of Athens and Atrous, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Allyria, during the government of these two peaceable Judges, Attreus, and after him Tantanes reigned. In Egypt, Amenophis, the son of Rameses, and afterwards Amnemes.

§. VIII.

Of the war of Thebes, which was in this age.

In this age was the War of Thebes, the most ancient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Luccretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection:

— Si nulla fuit genitilis origo
Rerumque & mundi semperque aeterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troja,
Non alias alii quoque res cecidere Poetae?

If all this World had no original, But things have ever been as now they are: Before the siege of Thebes, or Trois last War? Why did no Poet sing some elder War?

It is true, that in these times Greece was very salvage, the Inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they used little; neither did they plant many trees, or sow more corn than was necessary for their subsistence. Money they had little or none; for it is thought that the name of money was not heard of in Greece, vvhien Homer did write, vvhio measures the value of Gold and Bras: by the vvvorth in cattel: saying, that the golden Armour of Glaucus was vvvorth an hundred Beeves; and the Copper Armour of Diomedes vvvorth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and vvvithout shame, and to steal horses or kine was the usual exercise of their great men. Their Towns were not many, vvhich of those that were vvalled were very few, and not great. For Aegene the principal City in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: bricly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in some small Towns of that half life of Peloponnesus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietness within their their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Albanians, because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the Land in general was very rude, it will easily appear to such as consider what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his History. Wherefore, as in these later times, idle Chronicles use when the want good matter, to fill whole Books with reports of great Frosts, or dry Summers, and other such things which no man cares to read; so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great Clouds which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucalion: or else rehearse Fables of men changed into Birds, of strange Monsters, of adultery committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begar, without writing ought that favoured of humanity before the time of the war of Thebes: the brief whereof is this.

Oedipus the son of Laius King of Thebes, having been cast forth when he was an Infant, because an Oracle foretold what evil should come to pass by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage, contending for the way, slay his own Father, not knowing either then or long after, vvhho he vvvas. Afterward he became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queen Jocasta, called by Hom Odysseus, Hom Epicaste: on vvvhom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two sons, Eteocles and Polynices. But vvhen in process of time, finding out by good circumstances, vvho vvvere his Parents, he understood the grievous murder and incest he had committed, he tore out his own eyes for grief, and left the City. His Wife (and Mother) did hang her self. Some say, that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, vvvas expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sons, because they suffered their father to be cast out of the Town, and aided him not. Howsoever it were, his two Sons made this agreement, that the one of them should reign one year, and the other another year, and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill observed. For when Polynices had after a years government reigned the Kingdom to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first year, he refused to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adrastus the son of Talaus then reigned, unto whose Palace coming by night, he was driven to seek lodging in an out-house, on the back-side.

There he met with Tydeus the son of O- neus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom striving about their lodging, he fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noise came forth and took up the quarrel. At which time perceiving in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lion, he remembered an old Oracle by which he was adviced to give his two Daughters in marriage to a Lion and a Bore: and accordingly he did bestow his Daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deiptyle upon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose levying an Army, and assembling as many valiant Captains as he could draw to follow him, he was desirous among others to carry Amphiarus the son of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiarus, who is said to have fore-seen all things, knowing well that none of the Captains should escape, save only Adrastus, did both utterly refuse to be one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiarus, offering unto her a very fair Bracelet, upon condition that she should cause her Husband to assist him. The Soothsayer knowing what should work his destiny, forbade his Wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the Bracelet was in her eye so precious a Jewel, that she could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controversie between Amphiarus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put unto the decision of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by solemn oath to stand to her appointment: she ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did love a Bracelet better than her Husband. He now finding that it was far more easie to foresee then avoid destiny, fought for such comfort as revenge might afford him, giving in charge unto his sons, that when they came to full age, they should kill their Mother, and make strong war upon the Thebans.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which, the seven chief Leaders were himself, Amphiarus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in stead of whom some name Mecesteus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Ætolian, and Parthenopæus the Arcadian, son of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Army came to the Nemean Wood, they met a Woman, whom they desired to help them to some Water; she having a Child in her arms, laid it down, and led the Argives to a Spring: but ere he returned, a Serpent had slain the Child. This Woman was Hippolyte the Daughter of Theos the Lemnian, whom he would have saved when the Woman of the Isle slew all the Males by conspiracy, intending to lead an Asian life. For such her Pity the Lemnian Wives did sell her to Pyrrus, and the Pyrrus to Igeus Lord of the Countrey about Nemea, whose young son Opheltes, or Archemorus did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When upon the Childs death she hid her self for fear of her Master, Amphiarus told her Sons where they should find her: and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had slain the Child, and in memory of the chance, did institute solemn funeral games, called Nemean, wherein Adrastus won the prize with his swift horse Arcon, Tydeus with the whorlbars, Amphiarus at running and quitoing, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopæus at shooting, and one Laodæus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who think that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus a Lacedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slain the Nemean Lion: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set down.

From Nemea the Argives marched onwards, arrived at Cithæron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victory in all of them, not without much envy and malice of the people, who laid fifty men in ambush to intercept him at his return to the army, of which fifty he slew all but one, whom he sent back to the City as a Reporter and Witnes of his Valour. When the Argives understood how resolved Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the City, and encamped round about it. Thebes is said to have had at that time seven gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far stronger, could scarce muster up more thousands than Thebes had gates) did compass the Town, Adrastus quartered before the Gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygean, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiarus at Proctus, Hippomedon at Ancheis, Parthenopæus at Eleia, and Polynices at Hippisla. In the mean season, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took advice of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised Victory to the Thebans, if Amenæus the son of Creon, principal man of the City, would vow himself to be slain in honour of Atars the goddess War. So full of malice and pride is the Devil, and lo envious at his Creators glory, that he not only challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice withal Divine worship, but commandeth us to offer our selves and our children unto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens understanding, and bewitched their Wits with ignorance and blind devotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or fear they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, fo did he wax less impudent in cunning, though not less malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanity. For King Diphius in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idol of that Countrey rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africa, and crucified the Priests in the Groves where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay in stead of the living: yet among the salvages in the West Indies these cruel offerings have been practised of late Ages: which, as it is a sufficient argument that *Satan*s malice is only covered and hidden by this subtilty among civil people: so it may serve as a probable conjecture of the barbarismes then reigning in Greece. For Menæcius, as soon as he understood that his death might purchase Victory to his people, bestowed himself (as he thought) upon Murs, killing himself before the gates of the City. Then was a battel fought, wherein the Argives prevailed first at the first, that Capaneus advancing laden to the Walls, got up upon the Ramparts, whence, when he fell, or was cast down, or (as Writers wave it) was stricken down by Jupiter with a thunder bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were slain in this battel, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrel in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, slew each other.

Another battel was fought after their death, wherein the sons of Astæus behaved themselves very valiantly: Ipharæus one of the sons slew Hippomedon, which was one of the seven Princes: Parthenopæus being another of the seven (who was said to have been been so fair, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slain by Amphidicus, or, as some say, by Perrichymenus the son of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus, by Mentelippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Aeneas was brought unto him by Amphyraus, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed up the brains. Upon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Jupiter such remedy for his wounds, as should have made him immortal, refused to bestow it upon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might have continued immortal, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The host of the Argives being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphyraus fled: of whom Amphyraus is said to have been swallowed quick into the earth, near to the River Iphesus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carcases, or drowned in the River: and his body never found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens; where sitting at an Altar, called the Altar of Mercy, he made supplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried: but caused Antigone, the only daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, because she had fought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creon's Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Army under the conduct of Thebes, which took Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argives to sepulture: at which time Evanthe the Wife of Capaneus threw her self into the funeral fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the sons of those Captains which were slain at Thebes, that any less revenge should be taken of their Fathers death, than the ruine of the City: Wherefore ten year after, having levied Forces, Egeus the son of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopaeus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Theban of Polynices, and Euripylus of Mecisteus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmaon, the son of Amphyraus: with whom also went his brother Ampholytus. Apollo promised Victory, if Alcmaon were their Captain, whom afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own Mother.

When they came to the City, they were encountered by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battel, and slew Aegialeus, yet was he put to the worst, and driven to fly, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcmaon. After this disaster, the Citizens began to desire composition; but in the mean time they conveyed themselves with their Wives and Children away from thence by night, and so began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Eftiaea. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entering into it, sacked it, threw down the Walls, and laid it waste; howbeit it is reported by some, that the Town was saved by Theban the son of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he saved the City from utter destruction, it is very likely; for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the War of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

Of Jephtha, and how the three hundred years which he speaketh of, Judg. 11. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts 13. 20. 1 Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronology about these times.

AFTER the death of Jair (near about whose time these things hapned in Greece, and during whose Government, and that of Thola, Israel lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law and Service of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoining, and imbraced the Idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites: with those of the Philistines. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistines.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppress'd, because they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were inforced to seek Jephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base born; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of devilish hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon condition that they should establish him their Governour after Victory. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammon's right, and fortified fortified the Title of Israel by many arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the war; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not only beat them out of the Plains, but forc'd them over the Mountains of Arabia, even to Minith, and Abel of the vineyards. Cities exult heretofore in the description of the Holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vain vow which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature he encountered, coming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his own daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted her self, and only desired two months time to bewail her Virginity on the Mountains of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that she was not offered, is more probable, which Borheus and others prove sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephtha's victory, or otherwise making way to their future calamity, and to the most grievous slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephtha, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had contended with Gideon. Jephtha hereupon inforced to defend himself against their fury, in the encounter slew of them 42000, which so weakened the body of the Land, as the Philistines had an easie conquest of them all not long after. Jephtha, after he had judged Israel six years, died: to whom succeeded Ibzan, who ruled seven years: after him Elon was their Judge ten years: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Now before I go on with the rest, it shall be necessary upon the occasion of Jephtha's account of the times, Jud. 11. 28. (where he says that Israel had then possess'd the East side of Jordan 300. years) to speak somewhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point, seeming repugnant or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute between Jephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Jephtha here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. years: S. Paul giveth to the Judges, as it seems, from the end of Josua to the last of Heb. 450. years. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomon's Temple, there were consumed 480. years. To the first, Beroaldus findeth Jephtha's 300. years to be 266. years, to wit, 18. of Josua, 40. of Othniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Deborah, 40. of Gideon, 30. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Jair: But Jephtha (saith Beroaldus) 12 facit unum puteth or propoeth a certain number for more certain uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecentessimum, ex quo nullus item ea de re movet Israel; so he speaketh (saith he) as meaning that then it was about, or well-nigh, the three hundred year, since Israel possess'd those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary finds more years than Jephtha named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israel's captivity, at several times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephtha forbore to repeat the whole sum, or any great part, lest the Ammonites should have justly objected, that 71. of those years the Israelites were in captivity, and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred years, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

To justify this account of 365. years, besides the 71. years of captivity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth also 28. years more, and so maketh up the sum of 365. These 28. years he findeth out thus: twenty years he gives to the Seniors between Josua and Othniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteen years to Josua his government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Josuephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius give him 27. Melancthon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28. years, is far more doubtful than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the years of affliction (to wit 34. years of the 71.) if we add them to the 266. years of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we have the full number of 300. years. Neither is it strange that Jephtha should leave out more than half of the years of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against the 71. years, and say, that during these years, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300. years remembered by Jephtha, to be 306. which odd years, saith he, Jephtha omitteth. But because the years of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306. but do only compound 266. therefore doth

Luther add to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia Petraea; which forty years of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266, make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luther's judgment herein: for in the dispute between Jeftia and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly; or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was possit. For it is said, quia cepit Israel terram meam, Bebold Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking; which Jeftia's answer also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Hefbon, and in her Towns; and in Arer, and in her Towns, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. years: why did ye not then recover them in that space? so as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. years: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents that Israel had to possess it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me: for we do not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Quirinus nevertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and faves, that this time of 300. years hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jeftia's narration: when he makes a brief repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. years (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. years: and not only the time in which Israel possit Gilead, according to the Text, and Jeftia's own words: of which I leave the judgment to others; to whom also I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480. years, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet find a more probable reconciliation of Saint Paul's and Jeftia's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jeftia's three hundred years of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites possit it, sehon and og had dispossit Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered sehon and og, the right of possession which they had, pall to Israel, and so Jeftia might say, that they had possit those Countries 300. years, reckoning 266. years of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings, sehon and og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of Saint Paul, Act. 13 that from the end of Josua, to the beginning of sammel, there past 450. years. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Funckius Krentzbenius, and Beza) for I have not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last year of Heli, but 357. years: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings 6. is said to be 480. years.

Now so far as much as Saint Paul (as it seems) finds 450. years from the death of Josua to the last of Heli, and leaves but thirty years for Saul and sammel, who governed 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Solomon who wore the Crown three whole years: ere that the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of Saint Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words [then afterward] being clearly referred to the death, or after the death of Josua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where Saint Luke, rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. years (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosis, for Triacosis 300. years for 300. years; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgment to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Josua, and from thence to the beginning of sammel he makes 430. years: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons years) 319. and of years of servitude and affliction under strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty years, is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40. years, in which the Philistims are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plain, that during all Sampsons time, they were Lords over Israel.

Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. years of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319. years, which two sums put together, make 430. years. And whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. years, he finds 20. years to make up Saint Paul's number, to have been spent after the death of Josua by the Seniors, before the Captivity of Cushan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. years added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approve this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Josua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the days of Josua, and all the days of the Elders that over-lived Josua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giveth 20. years, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficulty in this opinion, if hereal to the 20. years of the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel should be denied. For they which deny these years, and make Othoniel 40. to begin presently upon the death of Josua, as in the beginning of this reckoning, they have 20. years less than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the years of affliction apart from the years of the Judges) in the number of Sampsons years, and of the forty years of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they have 20. years more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. years of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to be the one half of the forty of the Philistims oppression; so that if the 20. years of the Seniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seems to enforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum before Sampson judged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. years, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Judge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. years between the end of Josua, and the beginning of sammel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. years, to which if we add the years of the Judges, which are 339. we have the just sum of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seem to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350. years, is to begin immediately, or soon after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be received for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Paul's words: And about the time of forty years, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: and he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses, and of his years spent in the Wilderness, then in the nineteenth verse he cometh unto the acts of Josua; which were, that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth Verse it followeth, Then afterward he gave them Judges about 450. years, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Paul's meaning, so far as my weak understanding can pierce it. The only inconvenience of any weight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seems irreconcilable with the account, 1 Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450. years between the end of Josua and the beginning of sammel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. years between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Solomon. To this difficulty Codoman answereth, that these 480. years, 1 Reg. 6. 1, must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. years after the beginning of Othoniel's government; from whence if we cast the years of the Judges, with the years of servitude (which sums, according to his account, of which we have already spoken, make 397. years) and to these years add the 40. of sammel, and Saul, and the 40. of David, and the 3. of Solomon, we shall have the just sum of 480. years. Neither is it hard, saith he, that the annus egressionis non incipiens, sed finis, the year of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the original) or the year after they came out of Egypt, may well be understood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so we find that things which were done forty years after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to have been done in their going out of Egypt; as Psalm 114. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven back. And Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus far it seems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exivissent, or ab exitu finito: for if Junius, Dent. 4. 45. do well read quum exivissent, for in exitu, as it seems that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exivissent?

The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said not to have had end until the 25. year after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end, till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not until this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared, Judg. 18. For doubtless to this time the Expedition may most conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephtha, and of Saint Paul, with that in the first of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is said, that the Expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othoniel lived all those 40. years of rest, of which Judg. 3. 11. so that by the 25. year after his victory, either he might have been dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might have refused all Sovereignty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. year after Othoniel's victory) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers, grounding their opinions on the plain Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in itself round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are let down. But seeing that he wanteth all help of authority, we may justly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded: it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth year of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own conjecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the office of a Judge after five and twenty years, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes?

Now concerning the rehearal of the Law

by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to have been, when Israel came out of Egypt: like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the Holy Land, for so all journeys with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I think that he can find no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a journey by an accident, or faith by converting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most improper it were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely, to say, that King Edward at his arrival out of Palestina did win Scotland, or died at Carlisle. How may we then believe that enterprize performed so many years after the division of the Land (which followed the conquest at the journey's end) should be said to have been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the onely guide for certain ages in sacred Chronology, should not take name and beginning from that illustrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principal of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and month are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the year and month wherein it expired) and the form of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Town by six hundred men, from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods Name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a year, because it best stood with his interpretation, so to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it self.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirm, that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets unto the time of Saul, did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose succession the Crown was established, and promise made of a Kingdom that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been been the true Messias) the Apostle was so far from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well known and beleived of the Jews to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. years consumed in the Wilderness, whereof no man doubted, saying, that God suffered their manners in the Wilderness about 40. years. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the division of the Land unto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whole time they required to have a King, there passed about 450. years. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleven years of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. years of the Judges: for this had been an impertinent digression from the argument, because then vvas the taking of Laish; at which he had in hand. Wherefore it is not a work so needful as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the sum of 480. years is so exprefly and purposely set down.

Now that the vvords of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronology, but must be taken, as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the vulgar, it is evident by his ascribing in the same place 40. years to the reign of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those years were divided between Saul and Samuel, yea, that far the greater part of them were spent under the government of the Prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reign of the King. As for those that vvith so much cunning forsake the general opinion, vvhen it favoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good mind, to help vvhere the need is not over-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The vvords of S. Paul were sufficiently justified by Beroaldus, as having reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those days, that the 111. years of servitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. years ascribed to the Judges; vvith account the Apostle vvould not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speak as the vulgar, qualifying it vvith a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadragesima & quinquaginta annis: As it were four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, vvould needs have it be so indeed, and therefore dis-joyns the members to make the account even. In so doing he dasheth himself against a notable Key: & Text, whereupon all Authors have builded,

(as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth call up the years from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomon's Temple, not omitting the very month it self.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) having already given faith to his own interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needful to find some new explication for that vvith is of it self most plain, and to examine his own conjecture upon a place that is full of controversy. Thus by expounding after a strange Method, that vvith is manifest by that vvith is obscure, he Joseph himself in those vvayes vvherein before him never man vvalked. Surely if one should urge him to give reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, that Othoniel could not govern above 25. years, because then vvas the taking of Laish; at which time there was no King in Israel; That the Danites must needs have taken Laish at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Egypt, vvithout excluding the years of servitude; And that the years of servitude must needs be included, for that otherwise he himself should have spent his time vainly in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to uphold a Paradox, I leave it to the decision of the judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our story. To the time of Jephtha are referred the death of Herenler, the rape of Helen by Park, and the provisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Aycena, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth year of Ilium: from which time, if the war of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elen, yet the Greeks had six years to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this War, Longa preparatio belli celeberrimam offert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedy victory: for the Greeks consumed ten years in the attempt; and Troy, as it seems, was entred, sackt, and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy taken, which was in the sixth year of Habdon, Aeneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule, died, after he had been the Father of 40. sons, and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. years of Israels oppression by the Philistines (of which Judg. 13. v. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year year of Jair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrel against Septa, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philistines had held them in servitude in their own territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then opprest: and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistines with so powerful an Army for their own deliverance, than against their own brethren the Israhelites? but Ammon being overthrown, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore they 40. years must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Samson, and afterward: or else they must be referred to the Interregnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Israel by Samson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the War of Troy.

S. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets, how they have observed historical truth.

THe War at Troy, with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this City, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather choose here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineal descent of their Princes, than to break the story into peices by rehearsing a-part in divers years, the diversity of currents.

The History of the ancient Kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their original, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Tenecr and Dardanus were the two Founders of that Kingdom. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineccius thinks) took from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it of him, then it rests upon the authority of Virgil, who faith thus:

Æneid. 1. Creta Jovis magni medio jacet insula Ponto:
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostra.
Centum Urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde Pater (si ritè audita re-cordor)
Teuctus Rhætæas primum est advectus ad
oras: Optavitque locum regno. Nondum Ilium & arces.
Pergamæ steterant: habitabant valibus imis.
Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiæque ara, Idæumque nemus.

In the main Sea the Ile of Crete doth lie:
Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.

There is a mount Ida: there in fruitful Land

An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.

Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Thence the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhætæan shores: and reigned there, Ere yet fair Ilium was built, and ere

The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought

In lowest Vales. Hence Cybele rites were brought:

Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remove;
And hence the name of our Idæan grove.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authority, that Tenecr first gave name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same book he speaks thus:

*Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere
glebe,
Oenotrii coluere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducts de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Jasiusque Pater, genus à quo principe nostrum.*

Hesperia the Gracians call the place:
An ancient fruitful Land, a warlike race, Oenotrians

Oenotrians held it: now the later progeny
Gives it their Captains name, & calls it Italy:
This last belongs to us; hence Dardanus, thence came the Author of your stock, Jasius.

*Annus equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis Juvenco ita fere fenes, hic ortus ad agris
Dardanus Idæus Phrygia penetravit ad urbes, Thraciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab sede profectum, Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cæli accipit, &c.*

Some old Aruncans, I remember well, (Though time have made the fame obscure) would tell

Of Dardanus, how born in Italy,
From hence he into Phrygia did lie.

And leaving Tuscanie (where he carst had place)

With Corytus did sail to Samothrace;
But now in thronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starry Sky.

But contrary to this, and so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucris, & Thracæ, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the son of Japhet: and that the Dardanians, Myrians, and Ascanians, mixt with the Trojans, were Germane Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the son of Gomer: of whom the Country, Lake, and River of Ascanius in Asia took name. That Ashkenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascanii, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times pass into Europe: that the name of Tenecr came of Tyrus, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Tenecr, whereas Halicarnassensis makes him an Asiatican, I find none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reported him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good means to find the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Tenecr were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diadorus, & others that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Son of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Country, not founder of the City; and his Daughter or Niece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Corintus: and that these were parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise; and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the son of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Corintus King of Hetruria, to whom she bare Jasius. Annius out of his Berosus finds the name of Cambablosion, to whom he gives the addition of Corytus, as a Title of dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Jasius; and further telling us very particularly of the faction between these Brethren, which grew to such a heat, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and therefore fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the History gives leave to Annius of saying what he list. 1, that love not to use such liberty, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Son of Jupiter, it must have been of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that lived about the war of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Berosus. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self with making any narrow search into these fabulous Antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the general fame; allowing to Tenecr such Parents as Diadorus gives, because others giving him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

§. II.

of the rape of Helen : and strength of both sides for the War.

Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very far ; saying, That whereas the Phœnicians had ravished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greeks, to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medæa, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldened to do the like ; not fearing such revenge as ensued. But all this narration seems frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to do with the injury of the Phœnicians ? Or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Io, plead any quarrel against him, that never had heard the name of Phœnicians ? Thucydides, a writer of unquestionable sincerity, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homer's time, which was long after the War of Troy, and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to think, that they should have fought revenge upon all Nations, as barbarous, for the injury received by one ; or that all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the World ; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redelivery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true : for Telamon (as it seems) was a cruel man, seeing his own son Tœncer durst not come in his sight, after the war of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Tœncer could not remedy) had slain himself. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill entreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely that Priamus her brother would seek to take her from her husband, with whom she had lived about thirty years, and to whom she had born children which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medæa, or Hesione, but was merely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to do that which in those daies was very common. For not only Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discourseth ; but all people were accustomed to steal Women and Cattel, if they could by strong hand or power get them : and having stollen them, either to sell them away in some far Country, or keep them to their own use. So did Thebes and Prythons attempt Proserpina ; and so did Thebes (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabit neer unto the Sea, for fear of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no less lawful than merchandize : wherefore Tyndarus, the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Thebes had made, caused all her Wooers, who were most of the principal men in Greece, to bind themselves by solemn oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should vouch all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made unto her Father Tyndarus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping : for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands : he was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his own ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon, and Menelaus ; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise ; take Arms against the Trojans. The Greeks Fleet was (by Homer's account) 1200. sayl, or thereabouts : but the vessels were not great : for it was not then the manner to build ships with decks ; only they used (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meet for robbing on the Sea ; the least of which carried fifty men, the greatest 120. every man (except Captains) being both a Mariner and a Soldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian Army consisted of 100000. men or thereabout. This was the greatest Army that ever was raised out of Greece : and the greatness of this Army doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did stand out against such forces : yet were the Trojans which inhabited the City, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homer's Iliads ; but but their followers and aids were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misla, and the greatest part of Asia the less, took part with the Trojans. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Affrica (though some think out of Aethiopia) came to their defence.

of the Grecians journey, and Embassy to Troy, and of Helen's being detained in Egypt, and of the sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Wherefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to trial of arms, it things might be compounded by treaty sent Menelaus and Ulysses Embassadors to Troy : who demanded Helen, and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain, Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The sum of his discourse is this.

Paris in his return with Helen, being driven by foul weather unto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them : dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen, had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the war, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed she had not been there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to ask his wife of Proteus. Homer, and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this History, thinking it a matter more magnificent, and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a fair Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta ; which voyage it were not easily believed that he made for pleasure, and if he were driven thither by contrary Winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul Weather. For Paris immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such Winds as he could get, and rather enduring any storm, than to commit himself to any Haven in the Greek Seas ; whereas Menelaus might have put into any port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, until such time as the Wind had come about, and served for his Navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the saying of the Egyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madness for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the war, and so many of his sons slain for the pleasure of one, who neither was heir to the Kingdom (for Hector was elder) nor equal in virtue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seem that Lætiar spake not more pleasantly then truly, when he said that Helen, at the war of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had been ravished by Thebes the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young, and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (the and Pollux being said by some to have been twins) who sailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the father of Ajax in their company, before the time that Hesione was taken ; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principal commander in the Trojan war. But whether it were so that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well entreated, for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy ; at which time Calchas (whom some say to have been a Runagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captains, and all the Host with many troublesome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnon's daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddess was contented with a Hind, it is not needful here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the Devil, which waits for all opportunities, is never more importunate, then where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatal impediments were removed : and that till ten years were past, the Town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise, under the command of Agamemnon ; who was accompanied with his Brother Menelaus, Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix, Ajax, and Tœncer, the sons of Telamon ; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones ; Nestor and his sons Antilochus and Thrasymides ; Ulysses, Menestheus the son of Petrus, Captain of the Athenians; Dionides the son of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes, Astolus, and Talmenus, the sons of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the son of Pean, who had the arrows of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the City could not be taken, Ajax the son of Oileus, Penelus, Theas, Eumelus, Tylandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the son of Hercules; Podalirius, and Machon, the sons of Aesculapius; Epeus, who is said to have made the wooden Horse, by which the town was taken; and Proteflus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatened death to him that landed first.

§. IV.

of the AUs of the Græcians at the siege.

These, and many other of less note, arriving at Troy, found such sharp entertainment, as might easily persuade them to think that the war would be more than one years work. For in the first encounter, they lost Proteflus, whom Heſtor slew, and many others, without any great harm done to the Trojans: save only that by their numbers of men, they wan ground enough to incamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principal impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallness of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Army. Hereupon they were compelled to fend some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherry-nests: others to rob upon the Sea for the relief of the Camp. Thus was the war protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the town receive little loss by them, having equal numbers to maintain the field against such Greeks as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, That from the first year, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all, and Heraclide commends as very credible, the report of Herodotus, that the Greeks did not lye before Troy the first nine years: but only did bear up and down the Seas, exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies country did block up the Town, unto which they returned not, until the fatal time drew near when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquiry which

Priamus made, when the Greek Princes came into the field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting upon an high tower (as Homer tells) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the town so many years together. Between these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one saying, that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the others that the whole army did spend the time in wasting the Sea-coasts. Neither do the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many towns and lands wasted, and the people carried into Captivity; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the army could not well, nor would have spared, if any service of importance had been to be performed before the City. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by general consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Camp, and a great pestilence arose among the Greeks: which Homer saith, that Apollo sent in revenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let go, for any ransom: but Heracides interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sun, who raised pestilent Fogs, by which the army was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the camp was over-pestered with those, who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention between Agamemnon and Achilles about the booty, whereof Agamemnon, as General, having first chosen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himself another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and so the rest of the chief Captains in order: when the South-sayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father Apollo's Priest, that so the pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that he alone would not lose his part of the spoils, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was fain to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her loss otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to fend forth his Captains. But the Greeks, encouraged encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the City without him and his Troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aid: partly drawn to that War by their Commanders who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the War began (as appears by his words in Homer), or for love of himself and his sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair Daughters; partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks when they waited the Countries adjoining unto Troy. So that when Heſtor issued out of the Town, he was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or quality of their Leaders. The principal Captains in the Trojan Army, were Heſtor, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other sons of Priamus: Æneas, Antenor, and his sons, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glancus, Astus, and the sons of Pantheus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrival; Memon, Queen Pembesilea, and others who came towards the end of the War. Between these and the Greeks were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tomb of King Ilius upon the Plain: and another at the very trenches of the Camp, wherein Heſtor brake through the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the son of Telamon, with his brother Tenex, were in a manner the only men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Heſtor, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another battel (for so Antiquity calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles Troops, relieving the weary Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Dionades, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes though fore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Heſtor. It was the manner of those Wars, having slain a man, to strip him, and hale away his body, nor restoring it without ransom, if he were one of mark. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the fucells of their Captains; who rode not upon horses, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three horses, which were guided by some trusty followers
